CHAPTER I.

THE vast Sylva Lida, which in the days of Charlemagne stretched far along the banks of the Seine, and formed a woody screen round the infant city of Paris, has now dwindled to a few thousand acres in the neighbourhood of St. Germain en Laye. Not so in the time of Louis the thirteenth. It was then one of the most magnificent forests of France, and, extending as far as the town of Fontenay, took indifferently the name of the Wood of Fontenay, or the Forest of Laye. That portion to the north of St. Germain has been long cut down : yet there are persons living, not many years since, who remembered some of the old trees still standing, bare, desolate, and lone, like parents who had seen the children of their hopes die around them in their prime.

Although much improvement in all the arts of life, and such increase of population, had taken place during the latter years of Henry the Fourth, and under the regency of Mary de Medicis, yet at the time of their son, Louis the Thirteenth, the country was still but thinly peopled, and far different from the gay, thronged land that it appears to-day. For besides that those were earlier times, there had been many a bitter and a heavy war, not only of France against her enemies, but of France against her children. Religious and political differences had caused division between man and man, had banished mutual confidence and social intercourse, and raised up those feuds and hatreds, which destroy domestic peace, and retard public improvement. Amidst general distrust and civil wars, industry had received no encouragement ; and where

But may your slave be soundly switch'd,
If your majesty is not oddly breech'd,
For you've got the wrong side before.'
Says the king, 'I do not care a groat;
One's breeches are scarcely worth a thought;
A beggar's a king when he's at his ease,
So turn them about which way you please,
And be quick, you s———."

Now St. Hubert, in all probability, is the only person who correctly knows how it happened, that the very unmeaning and inapplicable ditty of Le bon roi Dagobert, should have been appropriated exclusively to the noble exercise of hunting, to which it has no reference whatever; but so it has been, and even to the present day where is the chasseur who cannot, as he returns from the chase, blow the notes, or sing the words of Le bon roi Dagobert?

Philip, as woodman, had heard it echoed and re-echoed through the forest from his very infancy; and now, without even knowing that he did so, he sang it as a matter of habit, although his mind was occupied by another subject; as men are always naturally inclined to employ their corporeal faculties on some indifferent object, when their mental ones are intensely engaged in things of deeper interest.

Philip advanced slowly along the road, with his brow knit in such a manner as to evince that his light song had little part in his thoughts. He was a man perhaps nearly fifty, still hale and athletic, though a life of labour had changed the once dark locks of his hair to gray. His occupation was at once denoted by his dress, which consisted simply of a long-bodied blue coat of coarse cloth, covered over, above is a somewhat free translation of the first verse, which stands thus in the French:

"Le bon roy Dagobert
Mettoit ses culottes à renvers.
Le bon St. Eloi
Lui dit, Oh mon Roy!
Que votre Majesté
Est bien mal culotté.
Eh bien, dit ce bon Roy,

except the arms, with what is called in Brittany, a Peau de bique, or goat skin; a pair of leather breeches cut off above the knee, with thick gaiters to defend his legs from the thorns, completed his dress below; and a round broad-brimmed hat was brought far over his eyes, to keep them from the glare of the declining sun. His apparel was girded round by a broad buff belt, in the left of which hung his woodman's knife: in the right he had placed the huge axe which he had been using in his morning's occupation: and thus accoutred, Philip would have been no insignificant opponent, had he met with any of those lawless rovers who occasionally frequented the forest.

As he approached his dwelling, he suddenly stopped, broke off his song, and turning round, listened for a moment attentively; but the only noise to be heard was the discordant cry of the jay in the trees round about; and the only living things visible were a few wild birds overhead, slowly winging their flight from the distant fields and vineyards towards their forest home.

Philip proceeded, but he sang no more; and opening the cottage door, he spoke to some one within, without entering. "Charles," demanded he, "has the young gentleman returned, who passed by this morning to hunt?"

"No, father," answered the boy, coming forward; "nobody has passed since you went—I am sure no one has, for I sat on the old tree all the morning, carving you a sun-dial out of the willow branch you brought home yesterday; and he drew forth one of those ingenious little machines, by means of which the French shepherds tell the time.

"Thou art a good boy," said his father, laying his hand on his head, "thou art a good boy." But still, as the woodman spoke, his mind seemed occupied by some anxiety, for again he looked up the road and listened. "There are strange faces in the forest," said Philip, not exactly soliloquizing, for his son was present, but certainly speaking more to himself than to the boy. "There are strange faces in the forest, and I fear me some ill deed is to be done. But here they come, thank God!—No! what is this?"

As he spoke, there appeared, just where the road turned into the wood, a sort of procession, which would have puzzled any one of later days, more than it did the woodman. It consisted of four men on horseback, and four on foot, escorting a vehicle, the most elegant and tasteful that the age produced. The people of that day had certainly very enlarged notions, if we may judge from the dimensions of their carriages. The one of which I speak would have contained any three of modern construction,—always excepting that in which his most gracious Majesty the King of England appears on state occasions, and also that of the Lord Mayor of London city.

Indeed it was far more like a state carriage than any other; broad at the top, low in the axle, all covered over with painting and gilding, with long wooden shafts for the horses, and green taffeta curtains to the windows; and in this guise it came on, swaying and swaggering about over the ruts in the road, not unlike the bloated Dutch pug of some over-indulgent dame, waddling slowly on, with its legs far apart, and its belly almost trailing on the ground.

When the carriage arrived at the abreuvoir, by the side of which Philip had placed himself, the footmen took the bridles from the horses' mouths, to give them drink, and a small white hand, from within, drew back the taffeta curtain, displaying to the woodman one of the loveliest faces he had ever beheld. The lady looked round for a moment on the forest scene, in the midst of whose wild ruggedness they stood, and then raised her eyes towards the sky, letting them roam over the clear deepening expanse of blue, as if to satisfy herself how much daylight still remained for their journey.

"How far is it to St. Germain, good friend?" said she, addressing the woodman, as she finished her contemplations; and her voice sounded to Philip like the warble of a bird, notwithstanding a slight peculiarity of intonation, which more refined ears would instantly have decided as the accent of Roussillon, or some adjacent province: the lengthening of the i, and the swelling roundness of the Spanish u, sounding very differently from the sharp precision peculiar to the Parisian pronunciation.

"I wish, Pauline, that you would get over that bad habit of softening all your syllables," said an old lady who sat beside her in the carriage. "Your French is scarcely comprehensible."

"Dear mamma!" replied the young lady playfully, "am I not descended lineally from Clemence Isaure, the patroness of song and chivalry? And I should be sorry to speak aught but my own langue d'oc—the tongue of the first knights and the first poets of France.—But hark! what is that noise in the wood?"

"Now help, for the love of God!" cried the woodman, snatching forth his axe, and turning to the horsemen who accompanied the carriage; "murder is doing in the forest. Help, for the love of God!"

But as he spoke, the trampling of a horse's feet was heard, and in a moment after, a stout black charger came down the road like lightning; the dust springing up under his feet, and the foam dropping from his bit.

Half falling from the saddle, half supported by the reins, appeared the form of a gallant young cavalier; his naked sword still clasped in his hand, but now fallen powerless, and dragging by the side of the horse; his head uncovered and thrown back, as if consciousness had almost left him, and the blood flowing from a deep wound in his forehead, and dripping amongst the thick curls of his dark brown hair.

The charger rushed furiously on; but the woodman caught the bridle as he passed, and with some difficulty reined him in; while one of the footmen lifted the young gentleman to the ground, and placed him at the foot of a tree.

The two ladies had not beheld this scene unconcerned, and were descending from the carriage, when four or five servants, in hunting livery, were seen issuing from the wood at the turn of the road, contending with a very superior party of horsemen, whose rusty equipments, and wild anomalous sort of apparel, bespoke them free of the forest by not the most honourable franchise.

"Ride on, ride on!" cried the young lady to those who had come with her; "Ride on and help them;" and she herself advanced to give aid to the wounded cavalier, whose eyes seemed now closed for ever.

He was as handsome a youth as one might look upon; one of those forms which we are fond to bestow upon the knights and heroes that we read of in our early days, when unchecked fancy is always ready to give her bright conceptions "a local habitation and a name." The young lady, whose heart had never been taught to regulate its beatings by the frigid rules of society, or the sharp scourge of disappointment, now took the wounded man's head upon her knee, and gazed for an instant upon his countenance, the deadly paleness of which appeared still more ghastly, from the red streams that trickled over it from the wound in his forehead. She then attempted to stanch the blood, but the trembling of her hands defeated her purpose, and rendered her assistance of but little avail.

The elder lady had hitherto been giving her directions to the footmen, who remained with the carriage, while those on horseback rode on towards the fray. "Stand to your arms, Michel!" cried she. "You take heed to the coach. You three, draw up across the road, each with his arquebuse ready to fire. Let none but the true men pass.—Fie! Pauline; I thought you had a firmer heart;" she continued, approaching the young lady, "Give me the handkerchief. That is a bad cut in his head, truly; but here is a worse stab in his side." And she proceeded to unloose the gold loops of his hunting-coat, that she might reach the wound. But that action seemed to recall, in a degree, the senses of the wounded cavalier.

"Never! never!" he exclaimed, clasping his hand upon his side, and thrusting her fingers away from him, with no very ceremonious courtesy,—“never, while I have life.”

"I wish to do you no harm, young sir, but good," replied the old lady;—"I seek but to stop the bleeding of your side, which is draining your heart dry."

The wounded man looked faintly round, his senses still bewildered, either by weakness from loss of blood, or from the stunning effects of the blow on his forehead. He seemed, however, to have caught and comprehended some of the words which the old lady addressed to him, and answered them by a slight inclination of the head, but still kept his hand upon the breast of his coat, as if he had some cause for wishing it not to be opened.

The time which had thus elapsed more than sufficed to bring the horsemen, who had accompanied the carriage (and who, as previously stated, had ridden on before), to the spot where the servants of the cavalier appeared contending with a party, not only greater in number, but superior in arms.

The reinforcement which thus arrived, gave a degree of equality to the two parties, though the freebooters might still have retained the advantage, had not one of their companions commanded them, in rather a peremptory manner, to quit the conflict. This personage, we must remark, was very different, in point of costume, from the forest gentry with whom he herded for the time. His dress was a rich livery suit of Isabel* and silver; and indeed he might have been confounded with the other party, had not his active co-operation with the banditti (or whatever else they were), placed the matter beyond a doubt.

Their obedience, also, to his commands showed, that if he were not the instigator of the violence we have described, at least his influence over his lawless companions was singularly powerful; for at a word from him they drew off from a combat in which they were before engaged with all the hungry fury of wolves eager for their prey. They then retreated in good order up the road, till its windings concealed them from the view of the servants to whom they had been opposed.

These last did not attempt to follow, but turning their horses, together with those who had brought them such timely aid, galloped up to the spot where their master lay. When they arrived, he had again fallen into a state of apparent insensibility, and they all flocked round him, with looks of eager anxiety, which seemed to speak more heartfelt interest than generally existed between the murmuring vassal and his feudal lord.

* A mixed colour, resembling that which in our own days has been called Esterhazy.

One sprightly boy, who appeared to be his page, sprang like lightning from his saddle, and kneeling by his side, gazed intently on his face, as if to seek some trace of animation. "They have killed him!" he cried at length, "I fear me they have killed him!"

"No, he is not dead," answered the old lady; "but I wish, Sir Page, that you would prevail on your master to open his coat, that we may staunch that deep wound in his side."

"No, no! that must not be," cried the boy quickly: "but I will tie my scarf round the wound." So saying, he unloosed the rich scarf of blue and gold, that passing over his right shoulder crossed his bosom till it nearly reached the hilt of his sword, where forming a large knot it covered the bucklings of his belt. This he bound tightly over the spot in his master's side from whence the blood flowed; and then asked thoughtfully, without raising his eyes, "but how shall we carry him to St. Germain?"

"In our carriage," said the young lady; "we are on our way thither, even now."

The sound of her voice made the page start; for since his arrival on the spot, he had scarcely noticed any one but his master, whose dangerous situation seemed to occupy all his thoughts: but now there was something in that sweet voice, with its soft Languedocian accent, which awakened other ideas, and he turned his full sunny face towards the lady who spoke.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed she, as that glance showed her a countenance not at all unfamiliar to her memory: "Is not this Henry de La Mothe, son of our old farmer Louis?"

"No other indeed, Mademoiselle Pauline," replied the boy; "though, truly, I neither hoped nor expected to see you at such a moment as this."

"Then who"—demanded the young lady, clasping her hands with a look of impatient anxiety—"in the name of heaven tell me who is this!"

For an instant, and but for an instant, a look of arch meaning played over the boy's countenance; but it was like a flash of lightning on a dark cloud, lost as quickly as it appeared, leaving a deep gloom behind it. "That, madam," said he, while something glistened brightly, but sadly, in his eye, as it fell upon the inanimate form of his master, "that is Claude Count de Blénau."

Pauline spoke not, but there was a deadly paleness come upon her face, which very plainly showed, how secondary a feeling is general benevolence, compared with personal interest.

"Is it possible?" exclaimed the elder lady, her brow darkening thoughtfully. "Well, something must be done for him."

The page did not seem particularly well pleased with the tone in which the lady spoke, and, in truth, it had betrayed more pride than compassion.

"The best thing that can be done for him, Madame la Marquise," answered he, "is to put him in the carriage and convey him to St. Germain as soon as possible, if you should not consider it too much trouble."

"Trouble!" exclaimed Pauline: "trouble! Henry de La Mothe, do you think that my mother or myself would find any thing a trouble, that could serve Claude de Blénau, in such a situation?"

"Hush, Pauline!" said her mother. "Of course we shall be glad to serve the Count.—Henry, help Michel and Regnard to place your master in the carriage.—Michel, give me your arquebuse; I will hold it till you have done. Henry, support your master's head."

But Pauline took that post upon herself, notwithstanding a glance from the Marchioness, if not intended to forbid, at least to disapprove. The young lady, however, was too much agitated with all that had occurred to remark her mother's looks, and following the first impulse of her feelings, while the servants carried him slowly to the carriage, she supported the head of the wounded Cavalier on her arm, though the blood continued to flow from the wound in his forehead, and dropping amidst the rich slashing of her Spanish sleeves, dabbled the satin with which it was lined.

"Oh Mademoiselle!" said the Page, when their task was accomplished, "this has been a sad day's hunting."

But if I might advise," he continued, turning to the Marchioness, "the drivers should be told to go with all speed."

"Saucy as a page!" said the old lady, "is a proverb, and a good one. Now, Monsieur La Mothe, I do not think the drivers must go with all speed; for humbly deferring to your better opinion, it would shake your master to death."

The Page bit his lip, and his cheek grew somewhat red, in answer to the high dame's rebuke; but he replied calmly, "You have seen, madam, what has happened to day, and depend on it, if we be not speedy in getting out of this accursed forest, we shall have the same good gentry upon us again, and perhaps in greater numbers. Though they have wounded the Count, they have not succeeded in their object; for he has still about him that which they would hazard all to gain."

"You are in the right, boy," answered the lady; "I was over-hasty. Go in, Pauline. Henry, your master's horse must carry one of my footmen; the other three can mount behind the carriage: thus we shall go quicker. You, with the Count's servants, mix with my horsemen, and keep close round the coach; and now bid them, on, with all speed." Thus saying, she entered the vehicle; and the rest having disposed themselves according to her orders, the whole cavalcade was soon in motion on the road to St. Germain.

CHAPTER II

THE sun had long gone down, and the large clear autumn moon had risen high in his stead, throwing a paler, but a gentler light upon the wood of Laye, and the rich wild forest scenery bordering the road from St. Germain to Mantes. The light, though unable to pierce the deeper recesses of the wood, fell full upon those old and majestic trees, the aristocracy of the forest, which, raising their heads high above their brethren of more recent growth, seemed to look upon the beam in which they shone, as the right of elder birth, and due alone to their aspiring height. The deep shadows of their branches stretched in long sombre shapes across the inequalities of the road, leaving but glimpses every now and then, to light the footsteps of whatever being might wander there at that hour of silence.

On one of those spots where the full beams fell, stood the cottage of Philip, the woodman; and the humble hut with its straw thatch; the open space of ground before it, with a felled oak which had lain there undisturbed till a coat of soft green moss had grown thick over its rugged bark; the little stream dammed up to afford a sufficient supply of water for the horses; and the large square block of stone to aid the traveller in mounting; all were displayed in the clear moonlight, as plainly as if day itself had shone upon them.

Yet, however fair might be the night, there were very few who would have chosen the beams of the moon to light them across the wood of Mantes. In sooth, in those days sunshine was the best safeguard to travellers: for France swarmed with those who gathered in their harvest at night, and who (to use their own phrase) had turned their swords into reaping-hooks.

Two grand objects fully occupied the mind of that famous minister, the Cardinal de Richelieu (who then governed the kingdom with almost despotic sway:) the prosecution of those mighty schemes of foreign policy, which at the time shook many a throne, and in after years changed more than one dynasty; and the establishment of his own power at home, which, threatened by factions, and attacked by continual conspiracies, was supported alone by the terror of his name, and the favour of a weak and irresolute monarch. These more immediate calls upon his attention gave him but little time to regulate the long-neglected police of the country; and indeed it was whispered, that Richelieu not only overlooked, but knowingly tolerated, many of the excesses of the times; the perpetrators of which were often called upon to do some of those good services which statesmen occasionally require of their less circumspect servants. It was said too, that scarce a forest in France but sheltered a band of these free rovers, who held themselves in readiness to merit pardon for their other offences, by offending in the State's behalf whenever it should be demanded, and in the mean time took very sufficient care to do those things on their own account for which they might be pardoned hereafter.

We may suppose then, it rarely happened that travellers chose that hour for passing through the wood of Mantes, and that those who did so were seldom of the best description. But on the night of which I speak, two horsemen wound slowly along the road towards the cottage of the woodman, with a sort of sauntering, idle pace, as if thoughtless of danger, and entirely occupied by their own conversation.

They were totally unattended also, although their dress bespoke a high station in society, and by its richness might have tempted a robber to inquire farther into their circumstances. Both were well-armed with pistol, sword, and dagger, and appeared as stout cavaliers as ever mounted horse, having, withal, that air of easy confidence, which is generally the result of long familiarity with urgent and perilous circumstances.

Having come near the abreuvoir, one of the two gave his horse to drink, without dismounting, while the other alighted, and taking out the bit, let his beast satisfy its thirst at liberty. As he did so, his eye naturally glanced over the ground at the foot of the tree. Something caught his attention; and stooping down to examine more closely, "Here is blood, Chavigni!" he exclaimed; "surely, they have never been stupid enough to do it here, within sight of this cottage."

"I hope they have not done it at all, Lafemas," replied the other. "I only told them to tie him, and search him thoroughly; but not to give him a scratch, if they could avoid it."

"Methinks, thou hast grown mighty ceremonious of late and somewhat merciful, Master Chavigni," replied his companion; "I remember the time, when you were not so scrupulous. Would it not have been the wiser way to have quieted this young plotter at once, when your men had him in their hands?"

"Thou wert born in the Fauxbourg St. Antoine, I would swear, and served apprenticeship to a butcher," replied Chavigni. "Why, thou art as fond of blood, Lafemas, as if thou hadst sucked it in thy cradle! Tell me, when thou wert an infant Hercules, didst thou not stick sheep instead of strangling serpents?"

"Not more than yourself, lying villain!" answered the other in a quick deep voice, making his hand sound upon the hilt of his sword. "Chavigni, you have taunted me all along the road; you have cast in my teeth things that you yourself caused me to do. Beware of yourself! Urge me not too far, lest you leave your bones in the forest!"

"Pshaw, man! pshaw!" cried Chavigni, laughing. "Here is a cool-headed judge! Here is the calm, placid Lafemas! Here's the cardinal's gentle hangman,—who can condemn his dearest friends to the torture with the same meek look that he puts on to say grace over a Beccafico,—suddenly metamorphosed into a bully and a bravo in the wood of Mantes!—But hark ye, sir judge!" he added, in a prouder tone, tossing back the plumes of his hat, which before hung partly over his face, and fixing his full dark eye upon his companion, who still stood scowling upon him with ill-repressed passion—"Hark ye, sir judge! Use no such language towards me, if you seek not to try that same sharp axe you have so often ordered for others. Suffice it for you to know, in the present instance, that it was not the cardinal's wish that the young man should be injured. We do not desire blood, but when the necessity of the State requires it to be shed. Besides, man—" and he gradually fell into his former jeering tone—"besides, in future, under your gentle guidance, and a touch or two of the peine forte et dure, this young nightingale may be taught to sing, and, in short, be forced to tell us all he knows. Now do you understand?"

"I do, I do," replied Lafemas. "I thought that there was some deep, damnable wile that made you spare him; and as to the rest, I did not mean to offend you. But when a man condemns his own soul to serve you, you should not taunt him, for it is hard to bear."

"Peace! peace?" cried Chavigni, in a sharp tone: "let me hear no more in this strain. Who raised you to what you are? We use you as you deserve; we pay you for your services; we despise you for your meanness; and as to your soul," he added with a sneer, "if you have any tears on that head—why you shall have absolution. Are you not our dog, who worries the game for us? We house and feed you, and you must take the lashes when it suits us to give them. Remember sir, that your life is in my hand! One word respecting the affair of Chalais mentioned to the cardinal, brings your head to the block! And now let us see what is this blood you speak of?"

So saying, he sprang from his horse, while Lafemas, as he had been depicted by his companion, hung his head like a cowed hound, and in sullen silence pointed out the blood, which had formed a little pool at the foot of the tree, and stained the ground in several places round about.

Chavigni gazed at it with evident symptoms of displeasure and uneasiness; for although, when he imagined that the necessities of the State required the severest infliction on any offender, no one was more ruthless than himself as to the punishment, no one more unhesitating as to the means—although, at those times, no bond of amity, no tie of kindred, would have stayed his hand, or restrained him in what he erroneously considered his political duty; yet Chavigni was far from naturally cruel; and, as his after-life showed, even too susceptible of the strongest and deepest affections of human nature.

In his early youth, the Cardinal de Richelieu had remarked in him a strong and penetrating mind; but above all, an extraordinary power of governing and even subduing the ardent passions by which he was at times excited. As son to the Count de Bouthillers, one of the oldest members of the Privy Council, the road to political preterment was open to Chavigni; and Richelieu, ever fearful of aught that might diminish his power, and careful to strengthen it by every means, resolved to bind the young count to his cause by the sure ties of early habit and mutual interest. With this view he took him entirely under his own protection, educated him in his own line of policy, instilled into him, as principles, the deep stern maxims of his own mighty and unshrinking mind, and having thus moulded him to his wish, called him early to the council-table, and intrusted him with a greater share of his power and confidence than he would have yielded to any other man.

Chavigni repaid the cardinal with heartfelt gratitude, with firm adherence, and uncompromising service. In private life, he was honourable, generous, and kind; but it was his axiom, that all must yield to State necessity, or (as he said) in other words, to the good of his country; and upon the strength of this maxim, which, in fact, was the cause of every stain that rests upon his memory, he fancied himself a patriot!

Between Chavigni and the Judge Lafemas, who was the Jeffreys of his country, and had received the name of Le Bouricaud du Cardinal, existed a sort of original antipathy; so that the statesman, though often obliged to make use of the less scrupulous talents of the judge, and even occasionally to associate with him, could never refrain for any length of time from breaking forth into those bitter taunts which often irritated Lafemas almost to frenzy. The hatred of the judge, on his part, was not less strong, even at the times it did not show itself; and he still brooded over the hope of exercising his ungentle functions upon him who was at present, in a degree, his master.

But to return. Chavigni gazed intently on the spot to which Lafemas pointed. "I believe it is blood, indeed," said he, after a moment's hesitation, as if the uncertainty of the light had made him doubt it at first: "they shall rue the day that they shed it contrary to my command. It is blood, surely, Lafemas: is it not?"

"Without a doubt," said Lafemas; "and it has been shed since mid-day."

"You are critical in these things, I know," replied the other with a cool sneer; "but we must hear more of this, sir judge, and ascertain what news is stirring, before we go farther. Things might chance, which would render it necessary that one or both of us should return to the cardinal. We will knock at this cottage and inquire. Our story must run, that we have lost our way in the wood, and need both rest and direction."

So saying, he struck several sharp blows with the hilt of his sword against the door, whose rickety and unsonorous nature returned a grumbling indistinct sound, as if it too had shared the sleep of the peaceable inhabitants of the cottage, and loved not to be disturbed by such nocturnal visitations. "So ho!" cried Chavigni; "will no one hear us poor travellers, who have lost our way in this forest?"

In a moment after, the head of Philip, the woodman appeared at the little casement by the side of the door, examining the strangers, on whose figures fell the full beams of the moon, with quite sufficient light to display the courtly form and garnishing of their apparel, and to show that they were no dangerous guests. "What would ye, messieurs?" demanded he, through the open window. "it is late for travellers."

"We have lost our way in your wood," replied Chavigni, "and would fain have a little rest, and some direction for our farther progress. We will pay thee well, good man, for thy hospitality."

"There is no need of payment, sir," said the woodman, opening the door. "Come in, I pray, messieurs.—Charles!" he added, calling to his son, "get up and tend these gentlemen's horses. Get up, I say, sir sluggard!"

The boy crept sleepily out of the room beyond, and went to give some of the forest-hay to the beasts which had borne the strangers thither, and which gave but little signs of needing either rest or refreshment. In the meanwhile, his father drew two large yew-tree seats to the fire-side, soon blew the white ashes on the hearth into a flame and having invited his guests to sit, and lighted the old brazen lamp that hung above the chimney, he bowed low, asking how he could serve them farther ; but as he did so, his eye ran over their persons with a half-satisfied and inquiring glance, which made Lafemas turn away his head. But Chavigni answered promptly to his offer of service : " Why now, good friend, if thou couldst give us a jug of wine, 'twould be well and kindly done, for we have ridden far."

" This is no inn, sir," replied Philip, " and you will find my wine but thin ; nevertheless, such as it is, most welcome shall you taste."

From whatever motive his coolness proceeded, Philip's hospitality was but lukewarm towards the strangers ; and the manner in which he rinsed out the tankard, drew the wine from a barrigue standing in one corner of the room, half-covered with a wolf-skin, and placed it on a table by the side of Chavigni, bespoke more churlish rudeness than good-will. But the statesman heeded little either the quality of his reception or of his wine, provided he could obtain the information he desired ; so, carrying the tankard to his lips, he drank, or seemed to drink, as deep a draught as if its contents had been the produce of the best vineyard in Medoc. " It is excellent," said he, handing it to Lafemas, " or my thirst does wonders. Now, good friend, if we had some venison-steaks to broil on yon clear ashes, our supper were complete."

" Such I have not to offer, sir," replied Philip, " or to that you should be welcome too."

" Why, I should have thought," said Chavigni, " the hunters who ran down a stag at your door to-day, would have left you a part, as the woodman's fee."

" Do you know those hunters, sir ?" demanded Philip, with some degree of emphasis.

" Not I in truth," replied Chavigni ; though the colour rose in his cheek notwithstanding his long training to courtly wile and political intrigue, and he thanked his stars that the lamp gave but a faint and glimmering light. " Not I, in truth ; but whoever ran him down got a good beast, for he bled like a stag of ten. I suppose they made the curée at your door ?"

" Those hunters, sir," replied Philip, " give no woodman's fees ; and as to the stag, he is as fine a one as ever brushed the forest dew, but he has escaped them this time."

"How! did he get off with his throat cut?" demanded Chavigni, "for there is blood enough at the foot of yon old tree, to have drained the stoutest stag that was ever brought to bay."

"Oh! but that is not stag's blood!" interrupted Charles, the woodman's son, who had by this time not only tended the strangers' horses, but examined every point of the quaint furniture with which it was the fashion of the day to adorn them. "That is not stag's blood; that is the blood of the young cavalier, who was hurt by the robbers, and taken away by—"

At this moment the boy's eye caught the impatient expression of his father's countenance.

"The truth is, messieurs," said Philip, taking up the discourse, "there was a gentleman wounded in the forest this morning. I never saw him before, and he was taken away in a carriage by some ladies, whose faces were equally strange to me."

"You have been somewhat mysterious upon this business, Sir Woodman," said Chavigni, his brow darkening as he spoke; "why were you so tardy in giving us this forest news, which imports all strangers travelling through the wood to know?"

"I hold it as a rule," replied Philip boldly, "to mind my own business, and never to mention any thing I see; which in this affair I shall do more especially, as one of the robbers had furniture of Isabel and silver;" and as he spoke he glanced his eye to the scarf of Chavigni, which was of that peculiar mixture of colours then called Isabel, bordered by a rich silver fringe.

"Fool!" muttered Chavigni between his teeth; "Fool! what need had he to show himself?"

Lafemas, who had hitherto been silent, now came to the relief of his companion: taking up the conversation in a mild and easy tone, "Have you many of these robbing fraternity in your wood?" said he; "if so, I suppose we peril ourselves in crossing it alone." And, without waiting for any answer, he proceeded, "Pray, who was the cavalier they attacked?"

"He was a stranger of St Germain," answered the woodman; "and as to the robbers, I doubt that they will show themselves again, for fear of being taken."

"They did not rob him then?" said the Judge. Now nothing that Philip had said bore out this inference; but Lafemas possessed in a high degree the talent of cross-examination, and was deeply versed in all the thousand arts of entangling a witness, or leading a prisoner to condemn himself. But there was a stern reserve about the woodman, which baffled the Judge's cunning: "I only saw the last part of the fray," replied Philip "and therefore know not what went before."

"Where was he hurt?" asked Lafemas; "for he lost much blood."

"On the head and in the side," answered the woodman.

"Poor youth?" cried the Judge in a pitiful tone. "And when you opened his coat, was the wound a deep one?"

"I cannot judge," replied Philip, "being no surgeon."

It was in vain that Lafemas tried all his wiles on the woodman, and that Chavigni, who soon joined in the conversation, questioned him more boldly. Philip was in no communicative mood, and yielded them but little information respecting the events of the morning.

At length, weary of this fruitless interrogatation, Chavigni started up—"Well, friend!" said he, "had there been danger in crossing the forest, we might have stayed with thee till daybreak; but, as thou sayest there is none, we will hence upon our way." So saying he strode towards the door, the flame shaped mullets of his gilded spurs jingling over the brick-floor of Philip's dwelling, and calling the woodman's attention to the knightly rank of his departing guest. In a few minutes all was prepared, and when they had mounted their horses, the statesman drew forth a small silk purse tied with a loop of gold, and holding it forth to Philip, bade him accept it for his services. The woodman bowed, repeating that he required no payment.

"I am not accustomed to have my bounty refused," said Chavigni proudly; and dropping the purse to the ground, he spurred forward his horse.

"Now Lafemas," said he, when they had proceeded so far as to be beyond the reach of Philip's ears, "what think you of this?"

"Why, truly," replied the Judge, "I deem that we are mighty near as wise as we were before."

"Not so," said Chavigni. "It is clear enough these fellows have failed, and De Blénau has preserved the packet. I understand it all. His Eminence of Richelieu, against my advice, has permitted Madame de Beaumont and her daughter Pauline to return to the Queen, after an absence of ten years. The fact is, that when the Cardinal banished them the court, and ordered the Marchioness to retire to Languedoc, his views were not so extended as they are now, and he had laid out in his own mind a match between one of his nieces and this rich young Count de Blénau; which, out of the royal family, was one of the best alliances in France. The boy, however, had been promised, and even I believe, affianced by his father, to this Pauline de Beaumont; and accordingly his Eminence sent away the girl and her mother, with the same sang froid that a man drives a strange dog out of his court-yard; at the same time he kept the youth at court, forbidding all communication with Languedoc. But now that the Cardinal can match his niece to the Duke D'Enghien, De Blénau may look for a bride where he lists, and the Marquise and her daughter have been suffered to return. To my knowledge they passed through Chartres yesterday morning, on their way to St. Germain."

"But what have these to do with the present affair?" demanded Lafemas.

"Why thus has it happened," continued Chavigni. "The youth has been attacked. He has resisted, and been wounded. Just then, up come these women, travelling through the forest, with a troop of servants, who join with the count, and drive our poor friends to cover. This is what I have drawn from the discourse of yon surly woodman."

"You mean from your own knowledge of the business," replied Lafemas, "for he would confess nothing."

"Confess, man!" exclaimed Chavigni. "Why he did not know that he was before a confessor, and still less before a judge, though thou wouldest fain have put him to the question. I saw your lip quivering with anxiety to order him the torture; rack, and thumb-screw, and subliette were in your eye, at every sullen answer he gave."

"Were it not as well to get him out of the way?" demanded Lafemas. "He remarked your livery, Chavigni, and may blab."

"Short-sighted mole!" replied his companion. "The very sulkiness of humour which has called down on him thy rage, will shield him from my fears—which might be quite as dangerous. He that is so close in one thing, depend upon it, will be close in another. Besides, unless he tells it to the trees, or the jays, or the wild boars, whom should he tell it to? I would bet a thousand crowns against the Prince de Conti's brains, or the Archbishop Coadjutor's religion, or Madame de Chevreuse's reputation, or against any thing else that is worth nothing, that this good woodman sees no human shape for the next ten years, and then all that passes between them will be, 'Good day, Woodman!'—'Good day, sir!'—and he mimicked the deep voice of him of whom they spoke.

"But, notwithstanding this appearance of gaiety, Chavigni was not easy; and even as he thus argued, he rode on with no small precipitation, till turning into a narrow forest path, the light of the moon, which had illumined the greater part of the high road, was cut off entirely by the trees, and the deep gloom obliged them to be more cautious in proceeding. At length, however, they came to a little savanna, surrounded by high oaks, where Chavigni entirely reined in his horse, and blew a single note on his horn, which was soon answered by a similar sound at some distance.

CHAPTER III.

THOSE whom either the love of sylvan sports, or that calm meditative charm inherent to wood scenery, has tempted to explore the deep recesses of the forest, must be well aware that many particular glades and coverts will often lie secret and undiscovered, amidst the mazes of the leafy labyrinth, even to the eyes of those long accustomed to investigate its most intricate windings. In those countries where forest hunting is a frequent sport, I have more than once found myself led on into scenes completely new, when I had fancied that long experience had made me fully acquainted with every rood of the woodland round about, and have often met with no small trouble in retracing the spot, although I took all pains to observe the way thither, and fix its distinctive marks in my memory.

In the heart of the forest of St. Germain, at a considerable distance from any of the roads, or even by-paths of the wood, lay a deep dingle or dell, which probably had been a gravel-pit many centuries before, and might have furnished forth sand to strew the halls of Charlemagne, for aught I know to the contrary. However, so many ages had elapsed since it had been employed for such purpose, that many a stout oak had sprung, and flourished, and faded, round about it, and had left the ruins of their once princely forms crumbling on its brink. At the time I speak of, a considerable part of the dell itself was filled up with tangled brushwood, which a long hot season had stripped and withered; and upon the edge hung a quantity of dry shrubs and stunted trees, forming a thick screen over the wild recess below.

One side, and one side only, was free of access, and this was by means of a small sandy path winding down to the bottom of the dell between two tall banks, which assumed almost the appearance of cliffs as the road descended. This little footway conducted, it is true, into the most profound part of the hollow, but then immediately, lost itself in the thick underwood, through which none but a very practised eye would have discovered the means of entering a deep lair of ground, sheltered by the steep bank and its superincumbent trees on one side, and concealed by a screen of wood on every other.

On the night I have mentioned, this well concealed retreat was tenanted by a group of men, whose wild attire harmonized perfectly with the rudeness of the scene around. The apparel of almost every class was discernible among them, but each vesture plainly showed, that it had long passed that epoch generally termed "better days;" and indeed, the more costly had been their original nature, the greater was their present state of degradation. So that what had once been the suit of some gay cavalier of the court, and which doubtless had shone as such in the circles of the bright and the fair, having since passed through the hands of the page, who had perhaps used it to personate his master, and the fripier, who had tried hard to restore it to a degree of lustre, and the poor petitioner who had bought it and borne it second-hand to court, and lost both his labour and his money—having passed through these, and perhaps a thousand other hands, it had gradually acquired that sort of undefinable tint, which ought properly to be called old-age colour, and at present served, and only served, to keep its owner from the winds of heaven. At the same time the buff jerkin which covered the broad shoulders of another hard by, though it had never boasted much finery, had escaped with only a few rusty stains from its former intimacy with a steel cuirass, and a slight greasy gloss upon the left side, which indicated its owner's habit of laying his hand upon his sword.

Here, too, every sort of offensive weapon was to be met with. The long Toledo blade, with its basket-hilt and black scabbard tipped with steel; the double-handed heavy sword, which during the wars of the League had often steadied well the troops of Henry the Fourth, when attacked by the superior cavalry of the Dukes of Guise and Mayenne, and which had been but little used since; the poniard, the stiletto, the heavy petronel, or horse pistol, and the smaller girdle pistol, which had been but lately introduced, were all to be seen, either as accompaniments to the dress of some of the party, or scattered about on the ground, where they had been placed for greater convenience.

The accoutrements of these denizens of the forest were kept in countenance by every other accessory circumstance of appearance; and a torch stuck in the sand in the midst, glared upon features which Salvator might have loved to trace. It was not alone the negligence of personal appearance, shown in their long dishevelled hair and untrimmed beards, which rendered them savagely picturesque, but many a furious passion had there written deep traces of its unbounded sway, and marked them with that wild undefinable expression, which habitual vice and lawless licence are sure to leave behind in their course.

At the moment I speak of, wine had been circulating very freely amongst the robbers; for such indeed they were. Some were sleeping, either with their hands clasped over their knees and their heads drooping down to meet them, or stretched more at their ease under the trees, snoring loud in answer to the wind, that whistled through the branches. Some sat gazing, with a wise sententious look, on the empty gourds, many of which, fashioned into bottles, lay scattered about upon the ground; and two or three, who had either drunk less of the potent liquor, or whose heads were better calculated to resist its effects than the rest, sat clustered together, singing and chatting by turns,—arrived exactly at that point of ebriety, where a man's real character shows itself, notwithstanding all his efforts to conceal it.

The buff jerkin we have spoken of, covered the shoulders of one among this little knot of choice spirits, who still woke to revel, after sleep had laid his leaden mace upon their companions; and it may be remarked, that a pair of broader shoulders are rarely to be seen than those so covered.

Wouvermans is said to have been very much puzzled by a figure in one of his pictures, which, notwithstanding all his efforts, he could never keep down (as painters express t.) Whatever he did, that one figure was always salient. And more prominent than the artist intended; nor was it till he had half blotted it out, that he discovered its original defect was being too large. Something like Wouvermans' figure, the freebooter I speak of stood conspicuous amongst the others, from the Herculean proportion of his limbs; but he had, in addition, other qualities to distinguish him from the rest. His brow was broad, and of that peculiar form to which physiognomists have attached the idea of a strong determined spirit; at the same time, the clear sparkle of his blue Norman eye bespoke an impetuous, but not a depraved mind.

A deep scar was apparent on his left cheek; and the wound which had been its progenitor, was most probably the cause of a sneering turn in the corner of his mouth, which, with a bold expression of daring confidence, completed the mute history that his face afforded, of a life spent in arms—or well, or ill, as circumstances prompted,—an unshrinking heart, which dared every personal evil, and a bright but unprincipled mind, which followed no dictates but the passions of the moment.

He was now in his gayest mood, and holding a horn in his hand, trolled to an old French ditty, seeming confident of pleasing, or perhaps careless whether he pleased or not.

ROBBER'S SONG.

"Thou'rt an ass, Robin, thou'rt an ass,
To think that great men be More gay than I that lie on the grass
Under the greenwood tree.
I tell thee no, I tell thee no,
The Great are slaves to their gilded show.

• Now tell me, Robin, tell me,
Are the ceilings of gay saloons
So richly wrought as yon sky we see,
Or their glitter so bright as the moon's?
I tell thee no, I tell thee no,
The Great are slaves to their gilded show.

Say not nay, Robin, say not nay!
There is never a heart so free,
In the vest of gold, and the palace gay,
As in buff 'neath the forest tree.

I tell thee yea, I tell thee yea,
The Great were made for the poor man's prey."

So sang the owner of the buff jerkin, and his song met with more or less applause from his companions, according to the particular humour of each. One only amongst the freebooters seemed scarcely to participate in the merriment. He had drunk as deeply as the rest, but he appeared neither gay, nor stupid, nor sleepy; and while the tall Norman sang, he cast, from time to time, a dark sneering glance upon the singer, which showed no especial love either for the music, or musician.

"You sing about prey," said he, as the other concluded the last stanza of his ditty—"You sing about prey, and yet you are no great falcon, after all; if we may judge from to-day."

"And why not, Monsieur Pierrepont Le Blanc?" demanded the Norman, without displaying aught of ill-humour in his countenance; "though they ought to have called you Monsieur Le Noir—Mr. Black, not Mr. White.—Nay, do not frown, good comrade; I speak but of your beard, not of your heart. What, art thou still grumbling because we did not cut the young count's throat outright?"

"Nay, not for that," answered the other, "but because we have lost the best man amongst us, for want of his being well seconded."

"You lie, Parbleu!" cried the Norman, drawing his sword, and fixing his thumb upon a stain, about three inches from the point. "Did not I lend the youth so much of my iron toothpick? and would have sent it through him, if his horse had not carried him away. But I know you, Master Buccaneer—you would have had me stab him behind, while Mortagne slashed his head before. That would have been a fit task for a Norman gentleman, and a soldier! I whose life he saved too!"

"Did you not swear, when you joined our troop," demanded the other, "to forget every thing that went before?"

The Norman hesitated; he well remembered an oath, against which the better feelings of his heart were perhaps sometimes rebellious. He felt, too, confused at the direct appeal the other had made to it; and to pass it by, he caught at the word forget, answering with a stave of the song—

“ Forget ! forget ! let slaves forget
The pangs and chains they bear,
The brave remember every debt
To honour and the fair ;
For these are bonds that bind us more,
Yet leave us freer than before.

“ Yes, let those that can do so, forget : but I very well remember, at the battle of Perpignan, I had charged with the advanced guard, when the fire of the enemy’s musketeers, and a masked battery which began to enfilade our line, soon threw our left flank into disorder, and a charge of cavalry drove back De Coucy’s troop. Mielleraye’s standard was in the hands of the enemy, when I and five others rallied to rescue it. A gloomy old Spaniard fired his petronel and disabled my left arm, but still I held the standard-pole with my right, keeping the standard before me ; but my Don drew his long Toledo, and had got the point to my breast, just going to run it through me and standard and all, as I’ve often spitted a duck’s liver and a piece of bacon on a skewer ; when, turning round my head, to see if no help was near, I perceived this young Count de Blénau’s banderol coming like lightning over the field, and driving all before it ; and blue and gold were then the best colours that ever I saw, for they gave me new heart, and wrenching the standard-pole round— But hark, there is the horn !”

As he spoke, the clear full note of a hunting-horn came swelling from the south-west ; and in a moment after, another, much nearer to them, seemed to answer the first. Each, after giving breath to one solitary note, relapsed into silence ; and such of the robbers as were awake, having listened till the signal met with a reply, bestirred themselves to rouse their sleeping companions, and to put some face of order upon the disarray which their revels had left behind.

“ Now, Sir Norman,” cried he that they distinguished by the name of Le Blanc ; “ we shall see how Monseigneur rates your slackness in his cause. Will you tell him your long story of the siege of Perpignan ?”

"Pardie!" cried the other, "I care no more for him, than I do for you. Every man that stands before me on forest ground is but a man, and I will treat him as such."

"Ha! ha! ha!" exclaimed his companion; "it were good to see thee bully a privy counsellor! why, thou darrest as soon take a lion by the beard."

"I dare pass my sword through his heart, were there need," answered the Norman; "but here they come,—stand you aside, and let me deal with him."

Approaching steps, and a rustling sound in the thick screen of wood already mentioned, as the long boughs were forced back by the passage of some person along the narrow pathway, announced the arrival of those for whom the robbers had been waiting.

"Why, it is as dark as the pit of Acheron," cried a deep voice amongst the trees. "Are we never to reach the light I saw from above? Oh, here it is.—Chavelin, hold back that bough it has caught my cloak." As the speaker uttered the last words, an armed servant, in Isabel and silver, appeared at the entrance of the path, holding back the stray branches, while Chavigni himself advanced into the circle of robbers,—who stood grouped around in strange picturesque attitudes; some standing forward boldly, as if to confront the daring stranger that thus intruded on their haunts; some gazing with a kind of curiosity upon the being so different to themselves, who had thus placed himself in sudden contact with them; some lowering upon him with bended heads, like wolves when they encounter a nobler beast of prey.

The statesman himself advanced in silence; and, with something of a frown upon his brow, ran his glance firmly over every face around, nor was there an eye amongst them that did not sink before the stern commanding fire of his, as it rested for a moment upon the countenance of each, seeming calmly to construe the expression of the features, and read into the soul beneath, as we often see a student turn over the pages of some foreign book, and collect their meaning at a glance.

"Well, sirs," said he at length, "my knave tells me that you have failed in executing my commands."

The Norman we have somewhat minutely described heretofore, now began to excuse himself and his fellows; and was proceeding to set forth that they had done all which came within their power and province to do, and was also engaged in stating, that no man could do more,—when Chavigni interrupted him. “Silence!” cried he, with but little apparent respect for these lords of the forest. “I blame ye not for not doing more than ye could do; but how dare ye, mongrel bloodhounds! to disobey my strict commands? when I bade you abstain from injuring the youth, how is it ye have mangled him like a stag torn by the wolves?”

The Norman turned with a look of subdued triumph towards him who had previously censured his forbearance. “Speak, speak, Le Blanc!” cried he; “answer Monseigneur.—Well,” continued he, as the other drew back, “the truth is this, Sir Count: we were divided in opinion with respect to the best method of fulfilling your commands, so we called a council of war—”

“A council of war!” repeated Chavigni, his lip curling into an ineffable sneer. “Well, proceed, proceed! You are a Norman, I presume—and braggart, I perceive.—Proceed, sir, proceed!”

Be it remarked, that by this time the influence of Chavigni’s first appearance had greatly worn away from the mind of the Norman. The commanding dignity of the statesman, though it still, in a degree, overawed, had lost the effect of novelty; and the bold heart of the free-booter began to reproach him for truckling to a being who was inferior to himself, according to his estimate of human dignities—an estimate formed not alone on personal courage, but also on personal strength.

However, as we have said, he was, in some measure, overawed; and though he would have done much to prove his daring in the sight of his companions, his mind was not yet sufficiently wrought up to shake off all respect, and he answered boldly, but calmly, “Well, Sir Count, give me your patience, and you shall hear. But my story must be told my own way, or not at all. We called a council of war, then, where every man gave his opinion, and my voice was for shooting Monsieur de Blénau’s horse as he rode by, and then taking advantage of the confusion among his lackeys, to seize upon his person, and carrying him into St. Herman's brake, which lies between Le Croix de bois and the river—you know where I mean, Monseigneur?"

"No, truly," answered the statesman; "but, as I guess, some deep part of the forest, where you could have searched him at your ease.—The plan was a good one. Why went it not forward?"

"You shall hear in good time," answered the freebooter, growing somewhat more familiar in his tone. "As you say, St. Herman's brake is deep enough in the forest—and if we had once housed him there, we might have searched him from top to toe for the packet—ay, and looked in his mouth, if we found it nowhere else. But the first objection was, that an arquebus, though a very pretty weapon, and pleasant serviceable companion in broad brawl and battle, talks too loud for secret-service, and the noise thereof might put the count's people on their guard before we could secure his person. However, they say, 'a Norman cow can always get over a stile;' so I offered to do the business with yon arbalete;" and he pointed to a steel crossbow lying near, of that peculiar shape which seems to unite the properties of the crossbow and the gun, propelling the ball or bolt by means of the stiff arched spring and cord, by which little noise is made, while the aim is rendered more certain by a long tube, similar to the barrel of a musket, through which the shot passes.

"When was I ever known to miss my aim?" continued the Norman. "Why, I always shoot my stags in the eye, for fear of hurting the skin. However, Mortagne—your old friend, Monsieur de Chavigni—who was a sort of band captain among us, loved blood as you know, like an unreclaimed falcon; besides, he had some old grudge against the count, who turned him out of the queen's anteroom, when he was ancient in the cardinal's guard. He it was who over-ruled my proposal. He would have shot him willingly enough, but your gentleman would not hear of that; so we attacked the count's train at the turn of the road—boldly, and in the face. Montagne was lucky enough to get a fair cut at his head, which slashed through his beaver, and, laid his skull bare, but went no farther, only serving to make the youth as savage as a hurt boar: for I had but time to see his hand laid upon his sword, when its cross was knocking against Montagne's ribs before, and the point shining out between his blade-bones behind. It was done in the twinkling of an eye."

"He is a gallant youth," said Chavigni; "he always was from a boy. But where is your wounded companion?"

"Wounded!" cried the Norman. "Odds life! he's dead. It was enough to have killed the devil. There he lies, poor fellow, wrapped in his cloak. Will you please to look upon him, sir counsellor?" and snatching up one of the torches, he approached the spot where the dead man lay, under a bank covered with withered brushwood and stunted trees.

Chavigni followed with a slow step and gloomy brow, the robbers drawing back at his approach; for though they held high birth in but little respect, the redoubted name and fearless bearing of the statesman had power over even their ungoverned spirits. He, however, who had been called Pierrepont Le Blanc by the tall Norman, twitched his companion by the sleeve as he lighted Chavigni on. "A cowed hound, Norman!" whispered he—"thou hast felt the lash—a cowed hound!"

The Norman glanced on him a look of fire; but passing on in silence, he disengaged the mantle from the corpse, and displayed the face of his dead comrade, whose calm closed eyes and unruffled features might have been supposed to picture quiet sleep, had not the ashy paleness of his cheek, and the drop of the under jaw, told that the soul no longer tenanted its earthly dwelling. The bosom of the unfortunate man remained open, in the state in which his companions had left it, after an ineffectual attempt to give him aid; and in the left side appeared a small wound, where the weapon of his opponent had found entrance, so trifling in appearance, that it seemed a marvel how so little a thing could overthrow the prodigious strength which those limbs announced, and rob them of that hardy spirit which animated them some few hours before.

Chavigni gazed upon him, with his arms crossed upon his breast, and for a moment his mind wandered far into those paths, to which such a sight naturally directs the course of our ideas, till, his thoughts losing themselves in the uncertainty of the void before them, by a sudden effort he recalled them to the business in which he was immediately engaged.

"Well, he has bitterly expiated the disobedience of my commands. But tell me," he said, turning to the Norman, who still continued to hold the torch over the dead man, "how is it ye have dared to force my servant to show himself, and my liveries, in this attack, contrary to my special order?"

"That is easily told," answered the Norman, assuming a tone equally bold and peremptory with that of the statesman. "Thus it stands, sir count: you men of quality often employ us nobility of the forest to do what you either cannot, or dare not do for yourselves; then, if all goes well, you pay us scantily for our pains; if it goes ill, you hang us for your own doings. But we will have none of that. If we are to be falcons for your game, we will risk the stroke of the heron's bill, but we will not have our necks wrung after we have struck the prey. When your lackey was present, it was your deed. Mark ye that, sir counsellor?"

"Villain, thou art insolent!" cried Chivigni, forgetting, in the height of passion, the fearful odds against him, in case of quarrel at such a moment. "How dare you, slave, to—"

"Villain! and slave!" cried the Norman, interrupting him, and laying his hand on his sword. "Know, proud sir, that I dare any thing. You are now in the green forest, not at council-board, to prate of daring."

Chavigni's dignity, like his prudence, became lost in his anger. "Boasting Norman coward!" cried he, "who had not even courage, when he saw his leader slain before his face—"

The Norman threw the torch from his hand, and drew his weapon ; but Chavigni's sword sprang in a moment from the scabbard. He was, perhaps, the best swordsman of his day ; and before his servant (who advanced, calling to Lafemas to come forth from the wood where he had remained from the first) could approach, or the robbers could show any signs of taking part in the fray, the blades of the statesman and the freebooter had crossed, and, maugre the Norman's vast strength, his weapon was instantly wrenched from his hand, and, flying over the heads of his companions, struck against the bank above.

Chavigni drew back, as if to pass his sword through the body of his opponent ; but the one moment he had thus been engaged, gave time for reflection on the imprudence of his conduct, and calmly returning his blade to its sheath, "Thou art no coward, after all," said he, addressing the Norman in a softened tone of voice ; "but trust me, friend, that boasting graces but little a brave man. As for the rest, it is no disgrace to have measured swords with Chavigni."

The Norman was one of those men so totally unaccustomed to command their passions, that, like slaves who have thrown off their chains, each struggles for the mastery, obtains it for a moment, and is again deprived of power by some one more violent still.

The dignity of the statesman's manner, the apparent generosity of his conduct, and the degree of gentleness with which he spoke, acted upon the feelings of the Norman, like the waves of the sea when they meet the waters of the Dordogne, driving them back even to their very source, with irresistible violence. An unwonted tear trembled in his eye. "Monseigneur, I have done foul wrong," said he, "in thus urging you, when you trusted yourself among us. But you have punished me more by your forbearance, than if you had passed your sword through my body."

"Ha ! such thoughts in a freebooter !" cried Chavigni. "Friend, this is not thy right trade. But what means all this smoke that gathers round us ?—Surely those bushes are on fire ;—see the sparks how they rise

His remark called the eyes of all upon that part of the dingle into which the Norman had incautiously thrown his torch, on drawing his sword upon the statesman. Continued sparks, mingled with a thick cloud of smoke, were rising quickly from it, showing plainly that the fire had caught some of the dry bushes thereabout; and in a moment after, a bright fitful flame burst forth, speedily communicating itself to the old withered oaks round the spot, and threatening to spread destruction into the heart of the forest.

In an instant all the robbers were engaged in the most strenuous endeavours to extinguish the fire; but the distance, to which the vast strength of the Norman had hurled the torch among the bushes, rendered access extremely difficult. No water was to be procured, and the means they employed, that of cutting down the smaller trees and bushes with their swords and axes, instead of opposing any obstacle to the flames, seemed rather to accelerate their progress. From bush to bush, from tree to tree, the impetuous element spread on, till, finding themselves almost girt in by the fire, the heat and smoke of which were becoming too intense for endurance, the robbers abandoned their useless efforts to extinguish it, and hurried to gather up their scattered arms and garments, before the flames reached the spot of their late revels.

The Norman, however, together with Chavigni and his servant, still continued their exertions; and even Lafemas, who had come forth from his hiding-place, gave some awkward assistance; when suddenly the Norman stopped, put his hand to his ear, to aid his hearing amidst the cracking of the wood and the roaring of the flames, and exclaimed, "I hear horse upon the hill—follow me, Monseigneur. St. Patrice guide us! this is a bad business: follow me!" So saying, three steps brought him to the flat below, where his companions were still engaged in gathering together all they had left on the ground.

"Messieurs!" he cried to the robbers, "leave all useless lumber. I hear horses coming down the hill. It must be a lieutenant of the forest, and the gardes champêtres, alarmed by the fire. Seek your horses, quick!—

each his own way. We meet at St. Herman's brake.— You, Monseigneur, follow me; I will be your guide; but, dally not, sir, if, as I guess, you would rather be deemed in the Rue St. Honoré, than in the forest of St. Germain."

So saying, he drew aside the boughs, disclosing a path somewhat to the right of that by which Chavigni had entered their retreat, and which apparently led to the high sand-cliff which flanked it on the north. The statesman, with his servant and Lafemas, followed quickly upon his steps, only lighted by the occasional gleam of the flames, as they flashed and flickered through the foliage of the trees.

Having to struggle every moment with the low branches of the hazel, and the tangled briars that shot across the path, it was some time ere they reached the bank, and there the footway they had hitherto followed seemed to end. "Here are steps," said the Norman, in a low voice; "hold by the boughs, Monseigneur, lest your footing fail. Here is the first step."

The ascent was not difficult, and in a few minutes they had lost sight of the dingle and the flames by which it was surrounded; only every now and then, where the branches opened, a broad red light fell upon their path, telling that the fire still raged with unabated fury. A moment or two after, they could perceive that the tract entered upon a small savanna, on which the moon was still shining, her beams showing with a strange sickly light, mingled as they were with the fitful gleams of the flames, and the red reflection of the sky. The whole of this small plain, however, was quite sufficiently illuminated to allow Chavigni and his companion to distinguish two horses, fastened by their bridles to a tree hard by; and a momentary glance convinced the statesman, that the spot where he and Lafemas had left their beasts, was again before him, although he had arrived there by another and much shorter path than that by which he had been conducted to the rendezvous.

"We have left all danger behind us, monseigneur," said the robber, after having carefully examined the savanna, to ascertain that no spy lurked amongst the trees around. "The flies are all swarming round the flames. There stand your horses—mount, and good speed attend you! Your servant must go with me, for our beasts are not so nigh."

Chavigni whispered a word in the robber's ear, who in return bowed low, with an air of profound respect. "I will attend your lordship—" replied he, "—and without fear."

"You may do so in safety," said the statesman, and mounting his horse, after waiting a moment for the judge, he took his way once more towards the high road to St. Germain.

CHAPTER IV.

WE must now return to the principal personage of our history, and accompany him on his way towards St. Germain, whither he was wending when last we left him.

There are some authors fond of holding their readers in suspense, of bringing them into unexpected situations, and surprising them into applause. All such things are extremely appropriate in a novel or romance; but as this is a true and authentic history, and as eke I detest what theatrical folks call "claptrap," I shall proceed to record the facts in the order in which they took place, as nearly as it is possible to do so, and will, like our old friend Othello, "a round unvarnished tale deliver."

The distance to St. Germain was considerable, and naturally appeared still longer than it really was, to persons unacquainted with one step of the road before them, and apprehensive of a thousand occurrences, both likely and unlikely. Nothing, however, happened to interrupt them on the way; and their journey passed over, not only in peace, but very much in silence also. Both the ladies who occupied the inside of the carriage, seemed to be sufficiently taken up with their own thoughts, and no way disposed to loquacity; so that the only break to the melancholy stillness which hung over them, was now and then a half-formed sentence, proceeding from what was rapidly passing in the mind of each, or the complaining creak of the heavy wheels, as they ground their unwilling way through the less practicable parts of the forest road.

At times, too, a groan from the lips of their wounded companion interrupted the silence, as the roughness of the way jolted the ponderous vehicle in which he was carried, and reawakened him to a sense of pain.

Long ere they had reached St. Germain, night had fallen over their journey, and nothing could be distinguished by those within the carriage, but the figures of the two horsemen who kept close to the windows. The interior was still darker, and it was only a kind of inarticulate sob from the other side, which made the marchioness inquire, "Pauline! you are not weeping?"

The young lady did not positively say whether she was so or not, but replied in a voice which showed her mother's conjecture to be well founded.

"It was not thus, mamma," she said, "that I had hoped to arrive at St. Germain."

"Fie, fie! Pauline," replied the old lady; "I have long tried to make you feel like a woman, and you are still a child, a weak child. These accidents, and worse than these, occur to every one in the course of life, and they must be met with fortitude. Have you flattered yourself that you would be exempt from the common sorrows of humanity?"

"But if he should die?" said Pauline, with the tone of one who longs to be soothed out of their fears. The old lady, however, applied no such unction to the wound in her daughter's heart. Madame de Beaumont had herself been reared in the school of adversity; and while her mind and principles had been thus strengthened and confirmed, her feelings had not been rendered more acute. In the present instance, whether she spoke it heedlessly, or whether she intended to destroy one passion by exciting another—to cure Pauline's grief by rousing her anger—her answer afforded but little consolation. "If he dies," said she dryly, "why I suppose the fair lady whose picture he has in his bosom would weep, and you——"

A deep groan from their wounded companion broke in upon her speech, and suggested to the marchioness that he might not be quite so insensible as he seemed. Such an answer, too, was not so palatable to Pauline as to induce her to urge the conversation any farther; so that Silence again resumed her empire over the party; remaining undisturbed till the old lady, drawing back the curtain, announced that they were entering St. Germain.

A few minutes more brought them to the lodging of the Count de Blénau; and here the marchioness descending, gave all the necessary directions, in order that the young gentleman might be carried to his sleeping-chamber, in the easiest and most convenient method; while Pauline, without proffering any aid, sat back in a dark corner of the carriage;—nor did any thing show that she was interested in what passed around her, but when the light of a torch, glaring into the vehicle, discovered a handkerchief pressed over her eyes, to hide the tears she could not restrain.

As soon as the count was safely lodged in his own dwelling, the carriage proceeded towards the palace,—which evinced but little appearance of regal state. However the mind of Pauline might have been accustomed to picture a court, in all the gay and splendid colouring which youthful imagination lends to anticipated pleasure, her thoughts were now far too fully occupied to admit of her noticing the lonely and deserted appearance of the scene. But to Madame de Beaumont it was different. She, who remembered St. Germain in other days, looked in vain for the lights flashing from every window of the palace; for the servants hurrying along the different avenues, the sentinels parading before every entrance, and the gay groups of courtiers and ladies, in all the brilliant costume of the time, which used to crowd the terrace and gardens to enjoy the cool, of the evening after the sun had gone down.

All that she remembered had had its day; and nothing remained but silence and solitude. A single sentry, at the principal gate, alone indicated the dwelling of a king, and it was not till the carriage had passed under the archway, that even an attendant presented himself, to inquire who were the comers at that late hour.

The principal domestic of Madame de Beaumont, who had already descended from his horse, gave the name of his lady with all ceremony, and also tendered a card (as he had been instructed by the marchioness), on which her style and title were fully displayed. The royal servant bowed low, saying that the queen, his mistress, had expected the marchioness before; and seizing the rope of a great bell, which hung above the staircase, he rang such a peal, that the empty galleries of the palace returned a kind of groaning echo to the rude clang which seemed to mock their loneliness.

Two or three more servants appeared, in answer to the bell's noisy summons; yet such was still the paucity of attendants, that Madame de Beaumont, even while she descended from her carriage, and began to ascend the "grand escalier," had need to look, from time to time, at the splendid fresco paintings which decorated the walls, and the crowns and fleurs-de-lis with which all the cornices were ornamented, before she could satisfy herself that she really was in the royal chateau of St. Germain.

Pauline's eyes, fixed on the floor, wandered little to any of the objects round; yet, perhaps, the vast spaciousness of the palace, contrasted with the scarcity of its inhabitants, might cast even an additional degree of gloom over her mind, saddened, as it already was, by the occurrences of the day. Doubtless, in the remote parts of Languedoc, where Pauline de Beaumont had hitherto dwelt, gay visions of a court had come floating upon imagination, like the lamps which the Hindoos commit to the waters of the Ganges, casting a wild and uncertain light upon the distant prospect;* and it is probable, that even if St. Germain had possessed all its former splendour, Pauline would still have been disappointed; for youthful imagination always outrivals plain reality; and besides, there is an unpleasing feeling of solitude communicated by the aspect of a strange place, which detracts greatly from the first pleasure of novelty. Thus there were a thousand reasons why Mademoiselle de Beaumont, as she followed the attendant through the long empty galleries and vacant chambers of the palace, towards the apartments prepared for her mother and herself, felt none of those happy sensations which she had anticipated from her arrival at court; nor was it till, on entering the ante-chamber of their suite of rooms, she beheld the gay smiling face of her Lyonnaise waiting-maid, that she felt there was any thing akin to old recollections within those cold and pompous walls, which seemed to look upon her as a stranger.

* I do not feel sure that I have not borrowed this comparison from some other writer; but if I have, I did so unintentionally.

The soubrette had been sent forward the day before, with a part of the Marchioness de Beaumont's equipage; and now, having endured a whole day's comparative silence with the patience and fortitude of a martyr, she advanced to the two ladies, with a loquacity in her countenance, as if resolved to make up, as speedily as possible, for the restraint under which her tongue had laboured during her short sojourn in the palace. But the deep gravity of Madame de Beaumont, and the melancholy air of her daughter, checked Louise in full career; so that, having kissed her mistress on both cheeks, she paused, while her lip, like an overflowed reservoir whose waters are trembling on the very brink, seemed ready to pour forth the torrent of words which she had so long suppressed.

Pauline, as she passed through the ante-room, wiped the last tears from her eyes, and on entering the saloon, approached a mirror which hung between the windows, as if to ascertain what traces they had left behind. The soubrette did not fail to advance, in order to adjust her young lady's dress, and finding herself once more in the exercise of her functions, the right of chattering seemed equally restored; for she commenced immediately, beginning in a low and respectful voice, but gradually increasing as she thought of her mistress was swallowed up in the more comprehensive idea of herself.

"Oh, dear mademoiselle," said she, "I am so glad you are come at last. This place is so sad and so dull! Who would think it was a court? Why, I expected to see it filled with lords and ladies, and instead of that, I have seen nothing but dismal-looking men, who go gliding about in silence, seeming afraid to open their lips, as if that cruel old cardinal, whom they all tremble at, could hear every word they say. I did see one fine-looking gentleman this morning, to be sure, with his servants all in beautiful liveries of blue and gold, and horses that seemed as if there were fire coming out of their very eyes; but he rode away to hunt, after he had been half an hour with the queen and Mademoiselle de Hauteford,* as they call her."

"Mademoiselle de what?" exclaimed Pauline, quickly, as if startled from her reverie by something curious in the name. "Who did you say, Louise?"

"Oh, such a pretty young lady!" replied the waiting-woman. "Mademoiselle de Hauteford is her name. I saw her this morning as she went to the queen's levee. She has eyes as blue as the sky, and teeth like pearls themselves; but withal she looks as cold and as proud as if she were the queen's own self."†

While the soubrette spoke, Pauline raised her large dark eyes to the tall Venetian mirror which stood before her, and which had never reflected any thing lovelier than herself, as hastily she passed her fair small hand across her brow, brushing back the glossy ringlets that hung

* Maria de Hauteford, after a long and troublesome life, the course of which her firm but somewhat harsh integrity alienated from the favour of that very queen whom she served with such devotion, died in 1691, at the age of seventy-five.

† The portrait given of her by M. de Motteville, is as follows:—
"Je m'arreteai seulement à Mademoiselle de Hauteford, qui fit, aussitôt qu'elle fut à la cour, de plus grands effets que toutes les beautés dont je viens de parler. Ses yeux étoient bleus, grands et pleins de feu; ses dents blanches et égales, et son teint avoit le blanc et l'incarnat nécessaire à une beauté blonde."

clustering over her forehead. But she was tired and pale with fatigue and anxiety ; her eyes, too, bore the traces of tears ; and with a sigh and look of dissatisfaction, she turned away from the mirror, which, like every other invention of human vanity, as often procures us disappointment as gratification.

Madame de Beaumont's eyes had been fixed upon Pauline ; and translating her daughter's looks with the instinctive acuteness of a mother, she approached with more gentleness than was her wont. " You are beautiful enough, my Pauline," said she, pressing a kiss upon her cheek ; " you are beautiful enough. Do not fear."

" Nay, mamma," replied Pauline, " I have nothing to fear, either from possessing or from wanting beauty."

" Thou art a silly girl, Pauline," continued her mother, " and take these trifles far too much to heart. Perhaps I was wrong concerning this same picture. It was but a random guess. Besides, even were it true, where were the mighty harm ? These men are all alike, Pauline. Like butterflies, they rest on a thousand flowers before they settle on any one. We all fancy that our own lover is different from his fellows ; but, believe me, my child, the best happiness a woman can boast, is that of being most carefully deceived."

" Then no such butterfly love for me, mamma," replied Pauline, her cheek slightly colouring as she spoke. " I would rather not know this sweet poison—love. My heart is still free though my fancy may have—have—"

" May have what, Pauline ?" demanded her mother, with a doubtful smile. " My dear child, thy heart and thy fancy, I trow, have not been so separate as thou thinkest."

" Nay, mamma," answered Pauline, " my fancy, like an insect, may have been caught in the web of a spider ; but the enemy has not yet seized me, and I will break through while I can."

" But, first, let us be sure that we are right," said Madame de Beaumont. " For as every rule has its exception, there be some men whose hearts are even worthy the acceptance of a squeamish girl, who, knowing no thing of the world, expects to meet with purity like her own. At all events, love, De Blénau is the soul of honour, and will not stoop to deceit. In justice, you must not judge without hearing him."

"But," said Pauline, not at all displeased with the refutation of her own ideas, and even wishing, perhaps, to afford her mother occasion to combat them anew,— "but—"

The sentence, however, was never destined to be concluded; for, as she spoke, the door of the apartment opened, and a form glided in, the appearance of which instantly arrested the words on Pauline's lips, and made her draw back with an instinctive feeling of respect.

The lady who entered had passed that earlier period of existence, when beauties and graces succeed each other without pause, like the flowers of spring, that go blooming on from the violet to the rose. She was in the summer of life, but it was the early summer, untouched by autumn; and her form, though it possessed no longer the airy lightness of youth, had acquired in dignity a degree of beauty which compensated for the softer loveliness that years had stolen away. Her brown hair fell in a profusion of large curls round a face which, if not strictly handsome, was highly pleasing: and even many sorrows and reverses, by mingling an expression of patient melancholy with the gentle majesty of her countenance, produced a greater degree of interest than the features could have originally excited.

Those even who sought for that mere stony beauty which exists independent of expression, would have perceived that her eyes were quick and fine; that her skin was of the most delicate whiteness, except where it was disfigured by the use of rouge; and that her small mouth might have served as a model to a statuary, especially while her lips arched with a warm smile of pleasure and affection, as advancing into the apartment, she pressed Madame de Beaumont to her bosom. On her part, the marchioness bending low, received the embrace of Anne of Austria, with the humble deference of a respectful subject towards the condescension of their sovereign.

"Once more restored to me, my dear Madame de Beaumont!" said the queen. "His eminence of Richelieu does indeed give me back one of the best of my friends. And this is your Pauline?" she added, turning to Made-moiselle de Beaumont. "You were but young, my fair Demoiselle, when last I saw you. You have grown up a lovely flower from a noble root; but truly you will never be spoiled by splendour at our court."

As she spoke, her mind seemed naturally to return to other days, and her eye fixed intently on the ground, as if engaged in tracing out the plan of her past existence; running over all the lines of sorrow, danger, and disappointed hope; till the task became too bitter, and she turned to the marchioness with one of those long, deep sighs, that almost always follow a review of the days gone by, forming a sort of epitaph to the dreams, the wishes, and the joys, that once were dear and are now no more.

"When you met me, De Beaumont," said the queen, "with the proud Duke of Guise on the banks of the Bidassoa—quitting the kingdom of my father, and entering the kingdom of my husband—with an army for my escort, and princes kneeling at my feet—little, little did ever you or I think, that Anne of Austria, the wife of a great king, and daughter of a long line of monarchs, would, in after years, be forced to dwell at St. Germain, without guards, without court, without attendants, but such as the Cardinal de Richelieu chooses to allow her. The Cardinal de Richelieu!" she proceeded thoughtfully; "the servant of my husband!—but no less the master of his master, and the king of his king."

"I can assure your majesty," replied Madame de Beaumont, with a deep tone of feeling which had no hypocrisy in it, for her whole heart was bound by habit, principle, and inclination, to her royal mistress. "I can assure your majesty, that many a tear have I shed over the sorrows of my queen; and when his eminence drove me from the court, I regretted not the splendour of a palace, I regretted not the honour of serving my sovereign, I regretted not the friends I left behind, or the hopes I lost; all I regretted was that I could not be the sharer of my mistress's misfortunes. But your majesty has now received a blessing from Heaven," she continued, willing to turn the conversation from the troubled course of memory to the more agreeable channels of hope—"a blessing which we scarcely dreamed of—a consolation under all present sorrows, and a bright prospect for the years to come."

"Oh, yes, my little Louis, you would say," replied the Queen, her face lightening with all a mother's joy as she spoke of her son. "He is indeed a cherub; and sure am I, that if God sends him years, he will redress his mother's wrongs, by proving the greatest of his race."

She spoke of the famous Louis the Fourteenth, and some might have thought she prophesied. But it was only the fervour of a mother's hope—an ebullition of that pure feeling, which alone, of all the affections of the heart, the most sordid poverty cannot destroy, and the proudest rank can hardly check.

"He is indeed a cherub," continued the Queen; "and such was your Pauline to you, De Beaumont, when the Cardinal drove you from my side: a consolation not only in your exile, but also in your mourning for your noble lord. Come near, young lady: let me see if thou art like thy father."

Pauline approached; and the Queen laying her hand gently upon her arm, ran her eye rapidly over her face and figure, every now and then pausing for a moment, and seeming to call memory to her aid, in the comparison she was making between the dead and the living. But suddenly she started back—"Sainte Vierge!" cried she, crossing herself, "your dress is all dabbled with blood. What bad omen is this?"

"May it please your majesty," said the Marchioness, half smiling at the Queen's superstition, for her own strong mind rejected many of the errors of the day, "that blood is only an omen of Pauline's charitable disposition; for in the forest hard by, we came up with a wounded cavalier, and like a true démoiselle errante, Pauline rendered him personal aid, even at the expense of her robe."

"Nay, nay, De Beaumont," said the Queen, "it matters not how it came; it is a bad omen: some misfortune is about to happen. I remember the day before my father died, the Conde de Saldana came to court with a spot of blood upon the lace of his cardinal ; and on that fatal day which——”

The door of the apartment at this moment opened, and Anne of Austria, filled with her own peculiar superstition, stopped in the midst of her speech, and turned her eye anxiously towards it, as if she expected the coming of some ghastly apparition. The figure that entered, however, though it possessed a dignity scarcely earthly, and calm, still grace—an almost inanimate composure—rarely seen in beings agitated by human passions, was, nevertheless, no form calculated to inspire alarm.

“ Oh, Mademoiselle de Hauteford !” cried the Queen, her face brightening as she spoke ; “ De Beaumont, you will love her, for that she is one of my firmest friends.”

At the name of De Hauteford, Pauline drew up her slight elegant form to its full height, with a wild start, like a deer suddenly frightened by some distant sound ; and drawing her hand across her forehead, she brushed back the two or three dark curls which had again fallen over her clear, fair brow.

“ De Hauteford !” cried Anne of Austria as the young lady advanced, “ what has happened ? You look pale—some evil is abroad.”

“ I would not have intruded on your majesty, or on these ladies,” said Mademoiselle de Hauteford with a graceful but cold inclination of the head towards the strangers, “ had it not been that Monsieur Seguin, your majesty’s surgeon, requests the favour of an audience immediately. Nor does he wish to be seen by the common attendants ; in truth, he has followed me to the antechamber, where he waits your majesty’s pleasure.”

“ Admit him, admit him !” cried the Queen. “ What can he want at this hour ?”

The surgeon was instantly brought into the presence of the Queen by Mademoiselle de Hauteford ; but, after approaching his royal mistress with a profound bow, he remained in silence, glancing his eye towards the strangers who stood in the apartment, in such a manner as to intimate that his communication required to be made in private.

"Speak, speak, Seguin!" cried the Queen, translating his look and answering it at once; "these are all friends, old and dear friends."

"If such be your majesty's pleasure," replied the surgeon, with that sort of short dry voice, which generally denotes a man of few words, "I must inform you at once, that the young Count de Blénau has been this morning attacked by robbers, while hunting in the forest, and is severely hurt."

While Seguin communicated this intelligence, Pauline (she scarce knew why) fixed her eyes upon Mademoiselle de Hauteford, whose clear, pale cheek, ever almost of the hue of alabaster, showed that it could become still paler. The Queen too, though the rouge she wore concealed any change of complexion, appeared manifestly agitated. "I told you so, De Beaumont," she exclaimed—"that blood foreboded evil: I never knew the sign to fail. This is bad news truly, Seguin," she continued. "Poor De Blénau! surely he will not die."

"I hope not, madam," replied the Surgeon; "I see every chance of his recovery."

"But speak more freely," said the Queen. "Have you learnt any thing from him? These are all friends, I tell you."

"The count is very weak, madam," answered Seguin, "both from loss of blood, and a stunning blow on the head; but he desired me to tell your majesty, that though the wound is in his side, his heart is uninjured!"

"Oh, I understand, I understand," exclaimed the Queen. "De Blénau is one out of a thousand. I must write him a note: follow me, Seguin. Good night, dear Madame de Beaumont. Farewell, Pauline!—Come to my levee to-morrow, and we will talk over old stories and new hopes.—But have a care, Pauline. No more blood upon your robe. It is a bad sign in the house of Austria."

The moment the Queen was gone, Pauline pleaded fatigue, and retired to her chamber, followed by her maid

Louise, who, be it remarked, had remained in the room during the royal visit.

"This is a strange place, this St. Germain," said the waiting-woman, as she undressed her mistress.

"It is indeed!" replied Pauline. "I wish I had never seen it. But of one thing let me warn you, Louise, before it is too late. Never repeat any thing you may see or hear, while you are at the court; for if you do, your life may answer for it."

"My life! Mademoiselle Pauline," exclaimed the sou-brette, as if she doubted her ears.

"Yes, indeed, your life!" replied the young lady; "So beware!"

"Then I wish I had never seen the place either," rejoined the maid; "for what is the use of seeing and hearing things, if one may not talk about them?—and who can be always watching one's tongue?"

CHAPTER V.

WITH the happy irregularity of all true stories, we must return, for a moment, to a very insignificant person—the woodman of Mantes. Indeed, I have to beg my readers's pardon for saying so much about any one under the rank of a chevalier at least: but all through this most untractable of all histories, I have been pestered with a set of shabby fellows in very indifferent circumstances;—woodcutters, robbers, gentlemen's servants, and the like, who make themselves so abominably useful, that though we wish them any where else all the time, we can no way do without them. Let the sin not be attributed to me; for I declare, upon my conscience, that when first I undertook to record this tale, I attempted a thorough reform; I superseded a number of subordinate characters, put others upon the retired list, and dismissed a great many as useless sinecurists. But when I had done, all was in confusion; and then, after considering matters of half an hour, and turning over a page or two in the book of Nature, I found, that the most brilliant actions and the greatest events were generally brought about from the meanest motives and most petty causes : I perceived, that women and valets-de-chambre govern the world : I found that saur-kraut had disagreed with Sarah Duchess of Marlborough—made her insolent to Queen Anne, made Queen Anne threaten to box her ears—made England resign her advantages over France—placed the Bourbon dynasty on the throne of Spain, and changed the face of Europe even to the present day. So, if saur-kraut did all this, surely I may return to Philip, the woodman of Mantes.

Chavigni, as we have seen, cast his purse upon the ground, and rode away from the cottage of the woodman, little heeding what, so insignificant an agent might do or say. Yet Philip's first thought was one which would have procured him speedy admission to the bastille, had Chavigni been able to divine its nature. "The young count shall know all about it," said Philip to himself. "That's a great rogue in Isabel and silver, for all his fine clothes, or I'm much mistaken."

His next object of attention was the purse; and after various pros and cons, Inclination, the best logician in the world, reasoned him into taking it. "For," said Philip, "dirty fingers soil no gold;" and having carefully put it into his pouch, the woodman laid his finger upon the side of his nose, and plunged headlong into a deep meditation concerning the best and least suspicious method of informing the young count de Blénau of all he had seen, heard, or suspected. We will not follow the course of this cogitation, which, as it doubtless took place in the French tongue, must necessarily suffer by translation; but taking a short cut straight through all the zigzags of Philip's mind, we will arrive directly at the conclusion, or rather at the consequences,—which were these. In the first place, he commanded his son Charles to load the mule with wood, notwithstanding the boy's observation, that no one would buy wood at that time of the morning, or rather the night: for, to make use of Shakspeare's language, the morn, far from being yet clad in any russet mantle, was snugly wrapped up in the blanket of the dark, and snoring away, fast asleep, like her betters.

Precisely in the same situation as Aurora, that is to say, soundly sleeping till her ordinary hour of rising, was Joan, the woodman's wife. Philip, however, by sundry efforts, contrived to awaken her to a sense of external things; and perceiving that, after various yawns and stretches, her mind had arrived at the point of comprehending a simple proposition, "Get up, Joan, get up!" cried he. "I want you to write a letter for me; writing being a gift that, by the blessing of God, I do not possess."

The wife readily obeyed; for Philip, though as kind as the air of spring, had a high notion of marital privileges, and did not often suffer his commands to be disputed within his little sphere of dominion. However, it seemed a sort of tenure by which his sway was held, that Joan his wife should share in all his secrets; and accordingly, in the present instance, the good woodman related in somewhat prolix style, not only all that had passed between Chavigni and Lafemas in the house, but much of what they had said before they even knocked at his door.

"For you must know, Joan," said he, "that I could not sleep for thinking of all this day's bad work; and, as I lay awake, I heard horses stop at the water, and people speaking, and very soon what they said made me wish to hear more, which I did, as I have told you. And now, Joan, I think it right as a Christian and a man, to let this young cavalier know what they are plotting against him. So sit thee down; here is pen and ink, and a plain sheet out of the boy's holy catechism, God forgive me! But it could not go to a better use."

It matters not much to tell all the various considerations which were weighed and discussed by Philip and his wife, in the construction of this epistle. Suffice it to say, that like two unskilful players at battledoor and shuttlecock, they bandied backwards and forwards the same objections a thousand times between them, for ever letting them drop, and taking them up again anew, till day was well risen before they had finished. Neither would it much edify the world, in all probability, to know the exact style and tenor of the composition when it was complete; although Philip heard his wife read it over with no small satisfaction, and doubtless thought it as pretty a piece of oratory as ever was penned.

It is now unfortunately lost to the public, and all that can be satisfactorily vouched upon the subject is, that it was calculated to convey to the Count de Blénau all the information which the woodcutter possessed, although that information might be clothed in homely language, without much perfection, either in writing or orthography.

When it had been read, and re-read, and twisted up according to the best conceit of the good couple, it was intrusted to Charles, the woodman's boy, with many a charge and direction concerning its delivery. For his part, glad of a day's sport, he readily undertook the task, and driving the laden mule before him, set out whistling on his way to St. Germain. He had not, however, proceeded far, when he was overtaken by Philip with new directions; the principal one being to say, if any one should actually see him deliver the note, and make inquiries, that it came from a lady. "For," said Philip,—and he thought the observation was a shrewd one,—“so handsome a youth as the young count must have many ladies who write to him.”

Charles did not very well comprehend what it was all about; but he was well enough contented, to serve the young count, who had given him many a kind word and a piece of silver, when the hunting-parties of the court had stopped to water their horses at the abreuvoir. The boy was diligent and active, and soon reached St. Germain. His next task was to find out the lodging of the Count de Blénau; and, after looking about for some time, he addressed himself, for information, to a stout, jovial-looking servant, who was sauntering down the street, gazing about at the various hotels, with a look of easy nonchalance, as if idleness was his employment.

“Why do you ask, my boy?” demanded the man, without answering his question.

“I want to sell my wood,” replied the woodman's son, remembering that his errand was to be private. "Where does he lodge, good sir?"

"Why, the count does not buy wood in this hot weather," rejoined the other.

"I should suppose the count does not buy wood, himself, at all," replied the boy, putting the question aside with all the shrewdness of a French peasant: "but, perhaps, his cook will."

"Suppose I buy your wood, my man," said the servant.

"Why, you are very welcome, sir," answered Charles; but if you do not want it, I pray you, in honesty, show me which is the Count de Blénau's hotel."

"Well, I will show thee," said the servant; "I am e'en going thither myself, on the part of the Marquise de Beaumont, to ask after the young count's health."

"Oh, then you are one of those who were with the carriage yesterday, when he was wounded in the wood," exclaimed the boy. "Now I remember your colours. Were you not one of those on horseback?"

"Even so," answered the man; "and if I forget not, thou art the woodman's boy. But come, prithee, tell us what is thy real errand with the count. We are all his friends, you know: and selling him the wood is all a tale."

Charles thought for a moment, to determine whether he should tell the man all he knew or not; but remembering the answer his father had furnished him with, he replied, "The truth then is, I carry him a note from a lady."

"Oh, ho! my little Mercury!" cried the servant; "so you are as close with your secrets as if you were an older politician. This is the way you sell wood, is it?"

"I do not know what you mean by Mercury," rejoined the boy.

"Why he was a great man in his day," replied the servant, "and, as I take it, used to come and go between the gods and goddesses; notwithstanding which, Monsieur Rubens, who is the greatest painter that ever lived, has painted this same Mercury as one of the late Queen's* council; but nevertheless he was a carrier of messages and so forth.

"Why, then, thou art more Mercury than I, for thou carriest a message, and I a letter," answered Charles, as they approached the hotel of the count, towards which they had been bending their steps during this conversation. Their proximity to his dwelling, in all probability, saved Charles from an angry answer; for his companion did not seem at all pleased with having the name of Mercury retorted upon himself; and intending strongly to impress upon the woodman's boy that he was a person of far too great consequence to be jested with, he assumed a tone of double pomposity towards the servant who appeared on the steps of the hotel. "Tell Henry de La Mothe, the count's page," said the servant, "that the Marquise de Beaumont has sent to inquire after his master's health,"

The servant retired with the message, and in a moment after Henry de La Mothe himself appeared, and informed the messenger that his master was greatly better. He had slept well, he said, during the night; and his surgeons assured him that the wounds which he had received were likely to produce no further harm than the weakness naturally consequent upon so great a loss of blood as that which he had sustained. Having given this message on his master's account, Henry, on his own, began to question the servant concerning many little particulars of his family; his father being, as already said, Fermier to Madame de Beaumont.

Charles, the woodman's son, perceiving that the conversation had turned to a subject too interesting soon to be discussed, glided past the marchioness's servant, placed the note he carried in the hand of the count's page, pressed his finger on his lip, in sign that it was to be given privately, and detaching himself from them, without waiting to be questioned, drove back his mule through the least known parts of the forest, and rendered an account to his father of the success of his expedition.

"Who can this note be from?" said the Marchioness de Beaumont's servant to Henry de La Mothe. "The boy told me it came from a lady."

"From Mademoiselle de Hauteford, probably," replied the page, thoughtfully. "I must give it to my master without delay, if he be strong enough to read it. We will talk more another day, good friend;"—and he left him.

"From Mademoiselle de Hauteford !" said the man. "Oh, oh !"—and he went home to tell all he knew to Louise, the soubrette.

CHAPTER VI.

THERE are some spots on the earth which seem marked out as the scene of extraordinary events, and which, without any peculiar beauty, or other intrinsic quality to recommend them, acquire a transcendent interest, as the theatre of great actions. Such is Chantilly, the history of whose walls might furnish many a lay to the poet, and many a moral to the sage ; and even now, by its magnificence and its decay, it offers a new comment on the vanity of splendour, and proves, by the forgotten greatness of its lords, how the waves of time are the true waters of oblivion.

Be that as it may, Montmorency, Condé, are names so woven in the web of history, that nothing can tear them out ; and these were the lords of Chantilly. But amongst all that its roof has sheltered, no one, perhaps, is more worthy of notice than Louis the Thirteenth : the son of Henry the Fourth and Mary de Medicis, born to an inheritance of high talents and high fortune, with the inspiring incitement of a father's glory, and the powerful support of a people's love.

It is sad that circumstance—that stumbling block of great minds—that confounder of deep-laid schemes—that little, mighty unseen controller of all man's actions, should find pleasure in bending to its will, that which Nature originally seemed to place above its sway. Endued with all the qualities a throne requires ; brave, wise, clear-sighted, and generous ; with his mother's talents and his father's courage; the events of his early life quelled every effort of Louis's mind, and left him but the slave of an ambitious minister! a monarch but in name; the shadow of a king! How it was so, matters not to this history—it is recorded on a more eloquent page. But at the time of my tale, the brighter part of life had passed away from king Louis; and now that it had fallen into the sear, he seemed to have given it up, as unworthy a farther effort. He struggled not even for that appearance of royal state which his proud minister was unwilling to allow him; and, retired at Chantilly, passed his time in a thousand weak amusements, which but served to hurry by the moments of a void and weary existence.

It was at this time that the first news of the Cardinal de Richelieu's illness began to be noised abroad. His health had long been declining; but so feared was that redoubtable minister, that though many remarked the increased hollowness of his dark eye, and the deepening lines upon his pale cheek, for long no one dared to whisper what many hoped—that the tyrant of both King and people was falling away under the sway of a still stronger hand.

The morning was yet in its prime. The gray mist had hardly rolled away from the old towers and battlements of the chateau of Chantilly, which, unlike the elegant building afterwards erected on the same spot, offered then little but strong fortified walls and turrets. The heavy night dew still lay sparkling upon the long grass in the avenues of the park, when two gentlemen were observed walking near the palace, turning up and down the alley, then called the Avenue de Luzarches, with that kind of sauntering pace which indicated their conversation to be of no very interesting description.

Perhaps, in all that vast variety of shapes which nature has bestowed upon mankind, and in all those innate differences by which she has distinguished man's soul, no two figures, or two minds, could have been found more opposite than those of the two men thus keeping a willing companionship—the Count de Fontrailles, and the Marquis de Cinq Mars, Grand Ecuyer, or, as it may be best translated, Master of the Horse.

Cinq Mars, though considerably above the common height of men, was formed in the most finished and elegant proportion; and possessed a native dignity of demeanour, which characterized even those wild gesticulations in which the excess of a bright and enthusiastic mind often led him to indulge.

On the other hand, Fontrailles, short in stature, and mean in appearance, was in countenance equally unprepossessing. He had but one redeeming feature, in the quick gray eye, that with the clear keenness of its light, seemed to penetrate the deepest thoughts of those upon whom it was turned.

Such is the description that history yields of these two celebrated men; and I will own that my banking after physiognomy has induced me to transcribe it here, inasmuch as the mind of each was like his person.*

In the heart of Cinq Mars dwelt a proud nobility of spirit, which, however he might be carried away by the fiery passions of his nature, ever dignified his actions with something of great and generous. But the soul of Fontrailles, ambitious, yet mean, wanted all the wild ardour of his companion, but wanted also all his better qualities: possessing alone that clear, piercing discernment, which, more like instinct than judgment, showed him always the exact moment of danger, and pointed out the means of safety.

And yet, though not friends, they were often (as I have said) companions: for Cinq Mars was too noble to suspect, and Fontrailles too wary to be known—besides, in the present instance, he had a point to carry, and therefore was doubly disguised.

"You have heard the news, doubtless, Cinq Mars," said Fontrailles, leading the way from the great Avenue de Luzarches into one of the smaller alleys, where they were less liable to be watched; for he well knew the conversation he thus broached would lead to those wild starts and gestures in his companion, which might call upon them some suspicion, if observed, Cinq Mars made no reply, and he proceeded. "The Cardinal is ill!" and he fixed his eye upon the Master of the Horse, as if he would search his soul. But Cinq Mars still was silent, and apparently deeply busied with other thoughts, continued beating the shrubs on each side of the path with his sheathed sword, without even a glance towards his companion. After a moment or two, however, he raised his head with an air of careless abstraction: "What a desert this place has become!" said he; "look how all these have grown up between the trees. One really might be as well in a forest as in a royal park now-a-days."

"But you have made no answer," rejoined Fontrailles, returning perseveringly to the point on which his companion seemed unwilling to touch: "I said, the Cardinal is ill."

"Well, well! I hear," answered Cinq Mars, with a peevish start, like a restive horse forced forward on a road he is unwilling to take. "What is it you would have me say?—That I am sorry for it? Well, be it so. I am sorry for it—sorry that a trifling sickness, which will pass away in a moon, should give France hopes of that liberation, which is yet far off."

"But, nevertheless, you would be sorry were this great man to die," said Fontrailles, putting it half as a question half as an undoubted proposition, and looking in the face of the Marquis, with an appearance of hesitating uncertainty.

Cinq Mars could contain himself no more. "What!" cried he vehemently, "sorry for the peace of the world!—sorry for the weal of my country!—sorry for the liberty of my King! Why, I tell thee, Fontrailles, should the Cardinal de Richelieu die, the people of France would join in pulling down the scaffolds and the gibbets to make bonfires of them, for joy at their deliverance!"

"Who ever dreamed of hearing you say so?" said his companion. "All France agrees with you, no doubt; but we all thought that the Marquis de Cinq Mars either loved the Cardinal, or feared him, too much to see his crimes."

"Fear him!" exclaimed Cinq Mars, the blood mounting to his cheek, as if the very name of fear wounded his sense of honour. He then paused, looked into his real feelings, shook his head mournfully, and after a moment's interval of bitter silence, added, "True, true! Who is there that does not fear him? Nevertheless, it is impossible to see one's country bleeding for the merciless cruelty of one man, the prisons filled with the best and bravest of the land to quiet his suspicions, and the King held in worse bondage than a slave to gratify the daring ambition of this insatiate churchman,—and not to wish that heaven had sent it otherwise."

"It is not heaven's fault, sir," replied Fontrailles; "it is our own, that we do suffer it. Had we one man in France who, with sufficient courage, talent, and influence, had the true spirit of a patriot, our unhappy country might soon be freed from the bondage under which she groans."

"But where shall we find such a man?" asked the master of the horse, either really not understanding the aim of Fontrailles, or wishing to force him to a clearer explanation of his purpose. "Such an undertaking as you hint at," he continued, "must be well considered, and well supported, to have any effect. It must be strengthened by wit—by courage—and by illustrious names. It must have the power of wealth, and the power of reputation. It must be the rousing of the lion with all his force, to shake off the toils by which he is encompassed."

"But still there must be some one to rouse him," said Fontrailles, fixing his eyes on Cinq Mars with a peculiar expression, as if to denote that he was the man alluded to. "Suppose this were France," he proceeded, unbuckling his sword from the belt, and drawing a few lines on the ground with the point of the sheath: "show me a province or a circle that will not rise at an hour's notice to cast off the yoke of this hated Cardinal. Here is Normandy, almost in a state of revolt;—here is Guienne, little better;—here is Sedan, our own;—here are the mountains of Auvergne, filled with those whom his tyranny has driven into their solitude for protection;—and here is Paris and its insulted Parliament, waiting but for opportunity."

"And here," said Cinq Mars, with a melancholy smile, following the example of his companion, and pointing out, with his sword, as if on a map, the supposed situations of the various places to which he referred—"And here is Peronne, and Rouen, and Havre, and Lyons, and Tours, and Brest, and Bordeaux, and every town or fortress in France, filled with his troops and governed by his creatures; and here is Flanders, with Chaunes and Miellercray, and fifteen thousand men, at his disposal; and here is Italy, with Bouillon, and as many more, ready to march at his command!"

"But suppose I could show," said Fontrailles, laying his hand on his companion's arm, and detaining him as he was about to walk on—"but suppose I could show, that Miellercray would not march,—that Bouillon would declare for us,—that England would aid us with money, and Spain would put five thousand men at our command,—that the king's own brother—"

Cinq Mars waved his hand: "No! no! no!" said he, in a firm, bitter tone: "Gaston of Orleans has led too many to the scaffold already. The weak, wavering Duke is ever the executioner of his friends. Remember poor Montmorency!"

"Let me proceed," said Fontrailles; "hear me to an end, and then judge. I say, suppose that the King's own brother should give us his name and influence, and the king himself should yield us his consent."

"Ha!" exclaimed Cinq Mars, pausing abruptly.—The idea of gaining the king had never occurred to him; and now it came like a ray of sunshine through a cloud, brightening the prospect which had been before in shadow. "Think you the king would consent?"

"Assuredly!" replied his companion. "Does he not hate the cardinal as much as any one? Does not his blood boil under the bonds he cannot break? And would he not bless the man who gave him freedom? Think, Cinq Mars!" he continued, endeavouring to throw much energy into his manner, for he knew that the ardent mind of his companion wanted but the spark of enthusiasm to inflame—"think, what a glorious object! to free alike the people and their sovereign, and to rescue the many victims even now destined to prove the tyrant's cruelty! Think, think of the glorious reward! the thanks of a king, the gratitude of a nation, and the blessings of thousands saved from dungeons and from death !”

It worked as he could have wished. The enthusiasm of his words had their full effect on the mind of his companion. As the other went on, the eye of Cinq Mars lightened with all the wild ardour of his nature ; and striking his hand upon the hilt of his sword, as if longing to draw it in the inspiring cause of his country’s liberty, “Glorious indeed !” he exclaimed,—“glorious indeed !”

But immediately after, fixing his glance upon the ground, he fell into meditation of the many circumstances of the times ; and as his mind ran over the difficulties and dangers which surrounded the enterprise, the enthusiasm which had beamed in his eye, like the last flash of an expiring fire, died away, and he replied with a sigh, “What you have described, Sir, is indeed a glorious form—but it is dead—it wants a soul. The king, though every thing great and noble, has been too long governed, now to act for himself. The Duke of Orleans is weak and undecided as a child. Bouillon is far away—”

“And where is Cinq Mars ?” demanded Fontrailles,—“where is the man whom the king really loves ? If Cinq Mars has forgot his own powers, so has not France ; and she now tells him—though by so weak a voice as mine—that he is destined to be the soul of this great body, to animate this goodly frame, to lead this conspiracy,—if that can be so called which has a king at its head, and princes for its support.”

“In these peaceable days, when we are taught to pray against privy conspiracy, both as a crime and a misfortune, the very name is startling to all orthodox ears ; but at the time I speak of, it had no such effect. Indeed from the commencement of the wars between Henri Quatre and the League, little else had existed but a succession of conspiracies, which one after another had involved every distinguished person in the country, and brought more than one noble head to the block. Men’s minds had become so accustomed to the sound, that the explosion of a new plot scarcely furnished matter for a day’s wonder ;—as the burghers of a besieged city at length hardly hear the roaring of the cannon against their walls; and so common had become the name of conspirator, that there were very few men in the realm who had not acquired a just title to such an appellation.

The word "conspiracy," therefore, carried nothing harsh or disagreeable to the mind of Cinq Mars. What Fontrailles proposed to him, bore a plausible aspect. It appeared likely to succeed; and if it did so, offered him that reward for which, of all others, his heart-beat—Glory! But there was one point on which he paused: "You forget," said he,—“you forget that I owe all to Richelieu—you forget that, however he may have wronged this country, he has not wronged me; and though I may wish that such a being did not exist, it is not for me to injure him.”

“True, most true!” replied his wily companion, who knew that the appearance of frank sincerity would win more from Cinq Mars than aught else: “if he has done as you say, be still his friend. Forget your country in your gratitude—though in the days of ancient virtue patriotism was held paramount. We must not hope for such things now—so no more of that. But if I can show that this proud minister has never served you; if I can prove that every honour which of late has fallen upon you, far from being the bounty of the cardinal, has proceeded solely from the favour of the king, and has been wrung from the hard churchman as a mere concession to the monarch’s whim; if it can be made clear that the Marquis Cinq Mars would now have been a duke and Constable of France, had not his kind friend the cardinal whispered he was unfit for such an office:—then will you have no longer the excuse of friendship, and your country’s call must and shall be heard.”

“I dare scarce credit your words, Fontrailles,” replied Cinq Mars. “You speak boldly,—but do you speak truly?”

“Most truly, on my life!” replied Fontrailles. “Think you, Cinq Mars, if I did not well know that I could prove each word I have said, that thus I would have placed my most hidden thoughts in the power of a man who avows himself the friend of Richelieu?”

"Prove to me—but prove to me, that I am not bound to him in gratitude," cried Cinq Mars, vehemently—"take from me the bonds by which he has chained my honour, and I will hurl him from his height of power, or die in the attempt."

"Hush!" exclaimed Fontrailles, laying his finger on his lips as they turned into another alley, "we are no longer alone. Govern yourself, Cinq Mars, and I will prove every tittle of what I have advanced, ere we be two hours older."

This was uttered in a low tone of voice; for there was indeed another group in the same avenue with themselves. The party, which was rapidly approaching, consisted of three persons, of whom one was a step in advance, and, though in no degree superior to the others in point of dress, was distinguished from them by that indescribable something which constitutes the idea of dignity. He was habited in a plain suit of black silk, with buttons of jet; and every part of his dress, even to the sheath and hilt of his couteau de chasse, corresponded both in colour and simplicity. On his right hand he wore a thick glove, of the particular kind generally used by the sportsmen of the period, but more particularly by those who employed themselves in the then fashionable sport of bird-catching; and the nets and snares of various kinds carried by the other two, seemed to evince that such had been the morning's amusement of the whole party.

The King, for such was the person who approached, was rather above the middle height, and of a spare habit. His complexion was very pale; and his hair, which had one time been of the richest brown, was now mingled throughout with gray. But still there was much to interest, both in his figure and countenance. There was a certain air of easy self-possession in all his movements; and even when occupied with the most trivial employments, which was often the case, there was still a degree of dignity in his manner, that seemed to show his innate feeling of their emptiness, and his own consciousness of how inferior they were, both to his situation and his talents. His features at all times appeared handsome, but more especially when any sudden excitement called up the latent animation of his dark brown eye, recalling to the minds of those who remembered the days gone before, that young and fiery prince who could not brook the usurped sway even of his own highly talented mother, but who had now become the slave of her slave. The consciousness of his fallen situation, and his inability to call up sufficient energy of mind to disengage himself, generally cast upon him an appearance of profound sadness: occasionally, however, flashes of angry irritability would break across the cloud of melancholy which hung over him, and show the full expression of his countenance, which at other times displayed nothing but the traces of deep and bitter thought, or a momentary sparkle of weak, unthinking merriment. So frequent, however, were the changes to be observed in the depressed monarch, that some persons even doubted whether they were not assumed to cover deeper intentions. It might be so, or it might not; but, at all events, between the intervals of these natural or acquired appearances, would often shine out strong gleams of his mother's unyielding spirit, or his father's generous heart.

The rapid pace with which he always proceeded, soon brought the king close to Cinq Mars and Fontrailles. "Good-morrow, Monsieur de Fontrailles," said he, as the count bowed low at his approach. "Do not remain uncovered. 'Tis a fine day for forest sports, but not for bare heads; though I have heard say, that if you were in the thickest mist of all Holland, you would see your way through it.—What! mon Grand Ecuyer," he continued, turning to Cinq Mars; "as sad as if thou hadst been plotting, and wert dreaming even now of the block and axe?" And with a kind and familiar air, he laid his hand upon his favourite's arm; who on his part started, as if the monarch had read his thoughts and foretold his doom.

A single word has sometimes lost or won an empire—even less than a single word, if we may believe the history of Darius's horse, who proclaimed his master emperor without speaking. However, Fontrailles fixed his eye on Cinq Mars, and seeing plainly the effect of Louis's speech, he hastened to wipe it away. "To calculate petty dangers.

in a great undertaking," said he, "were as weak as to think over all the falls one may meet with in the chase, before we get on horseback."

Both Cinq Mars and the king were passionately fond of the noble forest sport, so that the simile of Fontrailles went directly home, more especially to the king, who, following the idea thus called up, made a personal application of it to him who introduced it. "Jesu, that were folly indeed!" he exclaimed, in answer to the count's observation. "But you are not fond of the chase either, Monsieur de Fontrailles, if I think right; I never saw you follow boar or stag, that I can call to mind."

"More my misfortune than my fault, sire," replied Fontrailles. "Had I ever been favoured with an invitation to follow the royal hounds, your majesty would have found me as keen of the sport as even St. Hubert is said to have been of yore."

"Blessed be his memory!" cried the king. "But we will hunt to-day; we will see you ride, Monsieur de Fontrailles. What say you, Cinq Mars? The parties who went out to turn a stag last night (I remember now), presented this morning, that in the busquet at the end of the forest, near Argenin, is quartered a fat stag of ten, and another by Boisjardin: but that by Argenin will be the best, for he has but one refuite by the long alley. Come, gentlemen, seek your boots—seek your boots; and as our Grand Veneur is not at Chantilly, you, Cinq Mars, shall superintend the chase. Order the Maître valet de chiens to assemble the old pack and the relais at the Currefour d'Argenin, and then we will quickly to horse." So saying, he turned away to prepare for his favourite sport; but scarcely had gone many paces ere he slackened his pace, and allowed the two gentlemen to rejoin him. "What think you, friend?" said he, addressing Cinq Mars; "they tell me, the cardinal is sick. Have you heard of it?"

"I have heard a vague report of the kind," replied Cinq Mars, watching his master's countenance, "but as yet nothing certain. May I crave what information your majesty possesses?"

"Why, he is sick, very sick," replied Louis, "and perchance may die. May his soul find mercy! Perchance he may die, and then—" and the king fell into deep thought.

It is possible that at that moment his mind was engaged in calculating all that such an event as the death of Richelieu would produce; for, gradually, as if he dreamed of ruling for himself, and as hope spread out before him many a future year of power and greatness, his air became more dignified, his eye flashed with its long repressed fire, and his step acquired a new degree of firmness and majesty.

Fontrailles watched the alteration of the king's countenance, and, skilful at reading the mind's workings by the face, he added, as if finishing the sentence which Louis had left unconcluded—but taking care to blend what he said with an air of raillery towards the Master of the Horse, lest he should offend the irritable monarch—"And then," said he, "Cinq Mars shall be a duke. Is it not so, sire?"

Louis started. His thoughts had been engaged in far greater schemes; and yet rewarding his friends and favourites, always formed a great part of the pleasure he anticipated in power, and he replied, without anger, "Most likely it will be so—indeed," he added, "had my wishes, as a man, been followed,"—and he turned kindly towards the Master of the Horse,—“it should have been so long ago, Cinq Mars. But kings, you know, are obliged to yield their private inclinations to what the state requires.”

Fontrailles glanced his eye towards the Grand Ecuyer, as if desiring him to remark the king's words. Cinq Mars bent his head, in token that he comprehended, and replied to the king: "I understand your majesty; but, believe me, sire, no honour or distinction could more bind Cinq Mars to his king, than duty, gratitude, and affection do at this moment."

"I believe thee, friend,—I believe thee, from my soul," said Louis. "God forgive us that we should desire the death of any man! and surely do not I that of the cardinal, for he is a good minister, and a man of powerful mind. But, withal, we may wish that he was more gentle and forgiving. Nevertheless, he is a great man. See how he thwarts and rules half the kings in Europe—see how he presses the emperor, and our good brother-in-law, Philip of Spain; while the great Gustavus, this northern hero, is little better than his general!”

“He is assuredly a great man, sire,” replied Cinq Mars. “But permit me to remark, that a great bad man is worse than one of less talents, for he has the extended capability of doing harm; and perhaps, sire, if this minister contented himself with thwarting kings abroad, he would do better than by opposing the will of his own sovereign at home.”

The time, however, was not yet come for Louis to make even an attempt toward liberating himself from the trammels to which he had been so long accustomed. Habit in this had far more power over his mind than even the vast and aspiring talents of Richelieu. No man in France, perhaps, more contemned or hated the cardinal than the royal slave whom he had so long subjugated to his burdensome sway. Yet Louis, amidst all his dreams for the future, looked with dread upon losing the support of a man whom he detested, but upon whose counsels and abilities he had been accustomed to rely with confidence and security.

Cinq Mars saw plainly the state of his master's mind; and as he entered the palace, he again began to doubt whether he should at all lend himself to the bold and dangerous measures which Fontrailles had suggested.

CHAPTER VII.

WHILE the king's mind, as he returned to the Chateau de Chantilly, was agitated by vague hopes and fears, which, like the forms that we trace in the clouds, rolled into a thousand strange and almost palpable shapes before his mind's eye, and yet were but a vapour after all; and while the thoughts of Cinq Mars ran over all the diff-culties and dangers of the future prospect, reverted to the obligations Richelieu had once conferred upon him, or scanned the faults and crimes of the minister, till the struggle of patriotism and gratitude left nothing but doubt behind; the imagination of Fontrailles was very differently occupied. It was not that he pondered the means of engaging more firmly the wavering mind of Cinq Mars. No, for he had marked him for his own; and from that morning's conversation, felt as sure of his companion as the ant-lion does of the insect he sees tremble on the edge of his pit. Neither did he revolve the probable issue of the dangerous schemes in which he was engaging both himself and others; for he was confident in his powers of disentangling himself, when it should become necessary to his own safety so to do, and he was not a man to distress himself for the danger of his friends. The occupation of his mind as they approached the castle, was of a more personal nature. The truth is, that so far from discomposing himself upon the score of distant evils, the sole trouble of his thoughts was the hunting-party into which he had been entrapped. Being by no means a good horseman, and caring not one sous for a pastime which involved far too much trouble and risk to accord in any degree with his idea of pleasure, Fontrailles had professed himself fond of hunting, merely to please the king, without ever dreaming that he should be called upon to give any farther proof of his veneration for the royal sport.

He saw plainly, however, that his case admitted of no remedy. Go he must; and, having enough philosophy in his nature to meet inevitable evils with an unshrinking mind, he prepared to encounter all the horrors of the chase, as if they were his principal delight.

He accordingly got into his boots with as much alacrity as their nature permitted; for each weighing fully eight pounds, they were somewhat ponderous and unmanageable. He then hastily loaded his pistols, stuck his couteau de chasse in his belt, and throwing the feather from his hat, was the first ready to mount in the courtyard.

"Why, how is this, Monsieur de Fontrailles?" said the king, who in a few minutes joined him in the area where the horses were assembled. "The first at your post! You are, indeed, keen for the sport. Some one, see for Cinq Mars. Oh! here he comes: mount, gentlemen, mount! Our ordinaries of the chase, and lieutenants, await us at the Carrefour d'Argeniz. Mount, gentlemen, mount! Ha! have you calculated your falls for to-day, Monsieur de Fontrailles, as you spoke of this morning?" And the king's eyes glistened with almost childish eagerness for his favourite pastime.

In the mean while, Cinq Mars had approached with a slow step and a gloomy countenance, showing none of the alacrity of Fontrailles, or the enthusiastic ardour of the king. "There are other dangers than falls to be met with in chase, my liege," said the Master of the Horse, with a bitter expression of displeasure in his manner; "and that Claude de Blénau could inform your majesty."

"I know not what you mean, Cinq Mars," answered the king. "De Blénau is a gallant cavalier; as stanch to his game as a beagle of the best; and though he shows more service to our queen than to ourself, he is not the less valued on that account."

"He is one cavalier out of ten thousand," replied Cinq Mars, warmly: "my dearest companion and friend; and whilst Cinq Mars has a sword to wield, De Blénau shall never want one to second his quarrel."

"Why, what ails thee, Cinq Mars!" demanded the king with some surprise. "Thou art angry,—what is it now?"

"It is, sire," replied the Master of the Horse, "that I have just had a courier from St. Germain, who bears me word, that three days since past, the count, as your majesty and I have often done, was hunting in the neighbourhood of Mantes, and was there most treacherously attacked by an armed band, in which adventure he suffered two wounds that nearly drained his good heart of blood. Shall this be tolerated, sire?"

"No, indeed! no, indeed!" replied the king with much warmth. "This shall be looked to. Our kingdom must not be overrun with robbers and brigands."

"Robbers!" exclaimed Cinq Mars, indignantly. "I know not—they may have been robbers; but my letter say, that one of them wore colours of Isabel and silver."

"Those are the colours of Chavigni's livery," replied the king, who knew the most minute difference in the bearing of every family in the kingdom, with wonderful precision. "This must be looked to, and it shall, or I am not deserving of my name. But now mount, gentlemen, mount! we are waited for at the rendezvous."

The Carrefour d'Argenin, at which the king and his attendants soon arrived, was a large open space in the forest, where four roads crossed. Each of these, but one, cut into a long straight avenue through the wood, opened a view of the country beyond, forming a separate landscape, framed, as it were, or, to use the French term, encadré, by the surrounding trees. The sun had not yet risen sufficiently to shine upon any of these forest roads: but the sweeping hills and dales beyond were to be seen through the apertures, richly lighted up by the clear beams of the morning; though occasionally a soft wreath of mist, lingering in the bosom of some of the hollows, would roll a transient shadow over the prospect. Louis had chosen this spot for the rendezvous, perhaps as much on account of its picturesque beauty, as for any other reason. Deprived, as he was, of courtly splendour and observance, his mind, unperverted by the giddy show and tinsel pomp that generally surrounds a royal station, regarded with a degree of enthusiasm the real loveliness of nature; and now it was sometime before even the preparations for his favourite sport could call his attention from the picturesque beauty of the spot.

The policy of Richelieu, which had led him to deprive the king of many of the external marks of sovereignty, as well as of the real power, taught him also to encourage all those sports which might at once occupy Louis's mind, and place him at a distance from the scene of government. Thus the hunting equipage of the king was maintained in almost more than royal luxury.

The first objects that presented themselves in the Carrefour d'Argenin, were a multitude of dogs and horses, grouped together with the lieutenants of the forest, and the various officers of the hunt, under those trees which would best afford them shade as the sun got up. Various piqueurs and valets were seen about the ground, some holding the horses, some laying out the table for the royal dejeûné, and some busily engaged in cutting long straight wands from the more pliable sort of trees, and peeling off the bark for a certain distance, so as to leave a sort of handle or hilt still covered, while the rest of the stick, about three feet in length, remained bare. These, called "batons de chasse," were first presented to the king, who, having chosen one, directed the rest to be distributed among his friends and attendants, for the purpose of guarding their heads from the boughs, which in the rapidity of the chase, while it continued in the forest, often inflicted serious injuries.

The Maître valet de chiens and his ordinaries, each armed with a portentous-looking horn, through the circles of which were passed a variety of dog couples, were busily occupied in distributing the hounds into their different relays, and the grooms and other attendants were seen trying the girths of the heavy hunting saddles, loading the pistols, or placing them in the holsters, and endeavouring to distinguish themselves fully as much by their hustle as by their activity.

It was an animated scene, and those who saw it could not wonder that Louis preferred the gay excitement of such sports, to the sombre monotony of a palace without a court, and royalty without its splendour.

After examining the preparations with a critical eye, and inquiring into the height, age, size, and other distinctive signs of the stag which was to be hunted, Louis placed himself at the breakfast-table which had been prepared in the midst of the green, and motioning Cinq Mars and Fontrailles to be seated, entered into a lively discussion concerning the proper spots for placing the relays of horses and dogs. At length it was determined that six hounds and four hunters should be stationed at about two leagues and a half on the high road; that twelve dogs and four piqueurs, with an ordinary of the chase, should take up a position upon the side of a hill under which the stag was likely to pass; and that another relay should remain at a spot called Le Croix de bois, within sight of which the hunt would be obliged to come, if the animal, avoiding the open country, made for the other extremity of the forest.

It fell upon Cinq Mars to communicate these directions to the officers of the hunt, which he did in that sort of jargon, which the sports of the field had made common in those days, but which would now be hardly intelligible. He was engaged in giving general orders, that the horses should be kept in the shade and ready to be mounted at a moment's notice, in case the king, or any of his suite, should require them, and that the ordinary should by no means let slip any of the dogs of the relay upon the stag, even if it passed his station, without especial orders from the piqueurs of the principal hunt—when suddenly he stopped, and pointing with his hand, a man was discovered standing in one of the avenues, apparently watching the royal party.

The circumstance would have passed without notice, had it not been for the extraordinary stature of the intruder, who appeared fully as tall as Cinq Mars himself. Attention was farther excited by his disappearing as soon as he was observed; and some grooms were sent to bring him before the king, but their search was in vain, and the matter was soon forgotten.

The minute relation of a royal hunt in France, anno 1642, would afford very little general interest. Enough has been said to show how different were the proceedings of that time from our method of conducting such things at present; and those who want farther information on the subject may find it in a very erudite treatise, "De la Chasse, &c." by Le Mercier, in the year fifty-six of the same century. We must, however, in a more general manner, follow the king over the field, though without attempting to describe all the minute occurrences of the day, or the particulars of etiquette usual on such occasions.

The stag, poor silly beast, who had been dozing away his time in a thicket at about half a mile distance, was soon roused by the very unwished appearance of the huntsmen; and taking his path down the principal avenue, bounded away towards the open country, calculating, more wisely than the beast recorded by our old friend Æsop, that the boughs might encumber his head gear. The horns sounded loud, the couples were unloosed, the dogs slipped, and away went man and beast in the pursuit. For a moment or two, the forest was filled with clang, and cry, and tumult:—as the hunt swept away, it grew fainter and fainter, till the sound, almost lost in the indistinct distance, left the deep glades of the wood to resume their original silence.

They did not, however, long appear solitary; for in a few minutes after the hunt had quitted the forest, the same tall figure, whose apparition had interrupted Cinq Mars in his oratory concerning the relays, emerged from one of the narrower paths, leading a strong black horse, whose trappings were thickly covered with a variety of different figures in brass, representing the signs of the zodiac, together with sundry triangles, crescents, and other shapes, such as formed part of the astrological quackery of that day. The appearance of the master was not less singular in point of dress than that of the horse. He wore a long black robe, somewhat in the shape of that borne by the order of Black Friars, but sprinkled with silver signs. This, which made him look truly gigantic, was bound round his waist by a broad girdle of white leather, traced all over with strange characters, that might have been called hieroglyphics, had they signified any thing; but which were, probably, as unmeaning as the science they were intended to dignify.*

To say the truth, the wearer did not seem particularly at his ease in his habiliments; for when, after having looked cautiously around, he attempted to mount his horse, the long drapery of his gown got entangled round his feet at every effort, and it was not till he had vented several very ungodly execrations, and effected a long rent in the back of his robe, that he accomplished the ascent into the saddle. Once there, however, the dexterity of his horsemanship, and his bearing altogether, made him appear much more like the captain of a band of heavy cavalry than an astrologer, notwithstanding the long snowy beard which hung down to his girdle, and the profusion of white locks that, escaping from his fur cap, floated wildly over his face, and concealed the greater part of its features.

* The apparition of such a person under such circumstances will not appear at all extraordinary to the reader, when he remembers that an astrologer named Moriu was concealed in the chamber of Anne of Austria at the moment she gave birth to Louis XIV., and that another quack of the same grade formed one of the household of the niece of Richelieu.

The horseman paused for a moment, seemingly immersed in thought, while his horse, being a less considerate beast than himself, kept pawing the ground, eager to set off. "Let me see," said the horseman: "the stag will soon be turned on the high road by the carriers for Clermont, and must come round under the hill, and then I would take the world to a Chapon de Maine, that that fool Andrieu lets slip his relay, and drives the beast to water. If so, I have them at the Croix de Bois. At all events, one must try." And thus speaking, he struck his horse hard with a thick kind of truncheon he held in his hand, and soon was out of the forest.

In the mean while the king and his suite followed close upon the hounds; the monarch and Cinq Mars, animated by the love of the chase, and Fontrailles risking to break his neck rather than be behind. The road for some way was perfectly unobstructed, and as long as it remained so, the stag followed it without deviation; but at length a train of carriers' waggons appeared, wending their way towards Clermont. The jingling of the bells on the yokes of the oxen, and the flaunting of the red and white ribbons on their horns, instantly startled the stag, who, stopping short in his flight, stood at gaze for a moment, and then darting across the country, entered a narrow track of that unproductive sandy kind of soil, called in France landes, which bordered the forest. It so happened—unfortunately, I was going to say, but doubtless the stag thought otherwise—that a large herd of his horned kindred were lying out in this very track enjoying the morning sunshine, and regaling themselves upon the first fruits that fell from some chestnut-trees, which in that place skirted the forest.

Now the stag, remembering an old saying, which signals the solace of "company in distress," proceeded straight into the midst of the herd, who being fat burghers of the wood, and, like many other fat burghers, somewhat selfish withal, far from compassionating his case, received him with scanty courtesy, and, in short, wished him at the devil. However, no time was to be lost; the dogs were close upon his steps: "sauve qui peut!" was the word among the stags, and away they all went, flying in every direction.

The hunters had as little cause to be pleased with this manœuvre as the stags; for the hounds being young, were deceived by a strong family likeness between one of the herd and the one they had so long followed, and all of the dogs but four, yielding up the real object of pursuit, gave chase to the strange stag, who, darting off to the left, took his way towards the river. Cinq Mars and most of the piqueurs, misled by seeing the young hounds have so great a majority, followed also. It was in vain the king called to him to come back, that he was hunting the wrong beast, and was as great a fool as a young hound: he neither heeded nor heard, and soon was out of sight.

"Sa Christi!" cried Louis, "there they go, just like the world, quitting the true pursuit to follow the first fool that runs, and priding themselves on being in the right when they are most in error; but come, Monsieur de Fontailles, we will follow the true stag of the hunt."

But Fontailles too was gone. The separation of the hounds had afforded an opportunity of quitting the sport not to be neglected, and he had slunk away towards the palace by the nearest road, which, leading through a narrow dell, skirted the side of the hill opposite to that over which the king's stag had taken his course. However, he still heard from time to time the dogs give tongue, and the hunting-cry of the king, who, without considering that no one followed, gave the exact number of mots on his horn, followed by the halloo, and the "Il dit vrai! il dit vrai !" which the piqueurs ordinarily give out, to announce that the dog who cried was upon the right scent. Still Fontrailles pursued his way, when suddenly he perceived the stag, who, having distanced the king, was brought to bay under the bank over which his road lay.

At that season of the year, the stag is peculiarly dangerous ; but Fontrailles did not want personal courage, and dismounting from his horse, he sprang to the bottom of the bank, where, drawing his couteau de chasse, he prepared to run in upon the beast ; but remembering at the moment that the king could not be far distant, he paused, and waiting till Louis came up, held the stirrup and offered his weapon to the monarch, who instantly running in, presented the knife with all the dexterity of an experienced sportsman, and in a moment laid the stag dead at his feet.

It was now the task of Fontrailles to keep off the hounds, while the king, anxious to have all the honours of the day to himself, began what is called in France the "section," and "curée aux chiens," without waiting for piqueurs or ordinaries. Nevertheless, he had only time to make the longitudinal division of the skin, and one of the transverse sections from the breast to the knee, when the sound of a horse's feet made him raise his head from his somewhat unkingly occupation, thinking that some of the other hunters must be now come up.

"Que Diable !" cried the king, viewing the strange figure of the astrologer, we have already noticed in this profound chapter. "Je veux dire, Vive Dieu ! What do you want ? and who are you ?"

"A friend to the son of Henri Quatre," replied the stranger, advancing his horse closer to the king, who stood gazing on him with no small degree of awe—for, be it remembered, that the superstitious belief in all sorts of necromancy was at its height both in England and France.

"A friend to the son of Henri Quatre, and one who comes to warn him of near-approaching dangers !"

"What are they, friend ?" demanded the king, with a look of credulous surprise : "Let me know whence they arise, and how they may be avoided, and your reward is sure."

"I seek no reward," replied the stranger, scornfully. "Can all the gold of France change the star of my destiny? No! Monarch, I come uncalled, and I will go unrewarded. The planets are still doubtful over your house, and therefore I forewarn you ere it be too late.—A Spaniard is seeking your overthrow, and a woman is plotting your ruin—a prince is scheming your destruction, and a queen is betraying your trust."

"How!" exclaimed Louis. "Am I to believe—"

"Ask me no questions," cried the stranger, who heard the trampling of horses' feet approaching the scene of conference. "In this roll is written the word of fate. Read it, O king! and timely guard against the evil that menaces." So saying, he threw a scroll of parchment before the king, and spurred on his horse to depart; but at that moment the figure of Cinq Mars, who by this time had run down the stag he had followed, presented itself in his way. "What mumming is this?" cried the Master of the Horse, regarding the stranger.

"Stop him! Cinq Mars," cried Fontrailles, who foresaw that the stranger's predictions might derange all his schemes. "He is an impostor: do not let him pass!" And at the same time he laid his hand upon the astrologer's bridle. But in a moment, the stranger, spurring on his charger, overturned Fontrailles, shivered the hunting sword, which Cinq Mars had drawn against him, to atoms with one blow of his truncheon, and scattering the grooms and huntsmen like a flock of sheep, was soon out of reach of pursuit.

"What means all this?" exclaimed Cinq Mars;—"explain, Fontrailles! Sire, shall we follow yon impostor?"

But Louis's eyes were fixed with a strained gaze upon the scroll, which he held in his hand, and which seemed to absorb every faculty of his soul. At length he raised them, mounted his horse in silence, and, still holding the parchment tight in his hand, rode on, exclaiming, "To Chantilly!"

CHAPTER VIII.

Who is there that has not dreamed and had their dream broken? Who is there that has not sighed to see spring flowers blighted—or summer sunshine yield to winter clouds—or bright hopes change to dark sorrows, and gay joys pass away like sudden meteors, which blaze for one splendid moment, and then drop powerless into the dark bosom of the night?

If memory, instead of softening all the traces, gave us back the original lines of life in their native harshness, who could live on to old age? for the catalogue of broken hopes, and disappointed wishes, and pleasures snatched from us never to return, would be more than any human mind could bear. It would harden the heart to marble, or break it in its youth. It is happy, too, that in early years our mind has greater power of resistance, for the novelty of sorrow gives it a double sting.

The fatigues of her journey had long worn off, and left Pauline de Beaumont the glow of wild youthful beauty, which had adorned her in her native hills. Her cheek had recovered its fine soft blush in all its warmth, and her eyes all their dark brilliancy. But the cheerful gaiety which had distinguished her, the light buoyancy of spirit, that seemed destined to rise above all the sorrows of the world, had not come back with the rose of her cheek, or the lustre of her eye. She loved to be alone; and instead of regretting the gloom and stillness which prevailed in the court of Anne of Austria, she often seemed to find its gaiety too much for her, and would retire to the suite of apartments appropriated to her mother and herself, to enjoy the solitude of her own thoughts.

At first Madame de Beaumont fancied that the melancholy of her daughter was occasioned by the sudden change from many loved scenes, endeared by all the remembrances of infancy, to others in which, as yet, she had acquired no interest. But as a second week followed the first, after their arrival at St. Germain's, and the same depression of spirits still continued, the marchioness began to fear that Pauline had some more serious cause of sorrow; and her mind reverted to the suspicions of De Bléneau's constancy, which she had been the first to excite in her daughter's bosom.

The coming time is filled with things that we know not, and chance calls forth so many unexpected events, that the only way in life is to wait for Fate, and seize the circumstances of the day—by the errors of the past to correct our actions at present, and to leave the future to a wiser judgment and a stronger hand. Madame de Beaumont took no notice of her daughter's melancholy, resolving to be guided in her conduct by approaching circumstances; for clouds were gathering thickly on the political horizon of France, which, like a thunder-storm depending on the fickle breath of the wind, might break in tempests over their head, or be wafted afar, and leave them still in peace.

It was one of those calm evenings, when the world, as if melancholy at the sun's decline, seems to watch in silence the departure of his latest beams. All had sunk into repose, not a cloud passed over the clear expanse of sky, not a noise was stirring upon earth; and Pauline felt a sensation of quiet, pensive melancholy steal over all her thoughts, harmonizing them with the stillness of the scene, as it lay tranquilly before her, extending far away to the glowing verge of heaven, unawakened by a sound, unruffled by a breath of air.

The window at which she sat looked towards St. Denis, where lay the bones of many a race of kings, who had, in turn, worn that often contested diadem, which to the winner had generally proved a crown of thorns. But her thoughts were not of them. The loss of early hope, the blight of only love, was the theme on which her mind brooded, like a mother over the tomb of her child. The scene before her—its vast extent—the dying splendour of the sun—the deep purity of the evening sky—the sublimity of the silence—wrought powerfully upon her mind; and while she thought of all the fairy hopes she had nourished from her youth, while she dreamed, over again, all the dreams she had indulged of one, on whose fame, on whose honour, on whose truth, she had fondly, rashly raised every wish of her future life; and while new-born fears and doubts came sweeping away the whole, the tears rose glistening in her eyes, and rolled, drop after drop, down her cheeks.

"Pauline!" said a voice close behind her. She started, turned towards the speaker, and with an impulse stronger than volition, held out her hand to Claude de Blè nau. "Pauline," said he, printing a warm kiss on the soft white hand that he held in his, "dear, beautiful Pauline! we have met at last."

From the moment he had spoken, Pauline resolved to believe him as immaculate as any human being ever was, since the first meeting of Adam and Eve; but still she wanted him to tell her so. It was not coquetry; but she was afraid that after what she had seen, and what she had heard, she ought not to be satisfied. Common propriety, she thought, required that she should be jealous till such time as he proved to her that she had no right to be so. She turned pale, and red, and drew back her hand without reply.

De Blè nau gazed on her for a moment in silent astonishment; for, young and ardent, and strongly tinged with that romantic spirit of gallantry which Anne of Austria had introduced from Spain into the court of France, the whole enthusiasm of his heart had been turned towards Pauline de Beaumont; and he had thought of her the more, perhaps, because forbid to think of her at all. Nor had the romance he had worked up in his own mind admitted a particle of the cold ceremonies of courtly etiquette; he had loved to figure it as something apart from the world. A life with her he loved, of ardour, and passion, and sunshiny hours, unclouded by a regret, unchilled by a reserve, but all boundless confidence, and unrestrained affection—such had been the purport of his letters to Pauline de Beaumont, and such had been the colouring of her replies to him. And who is there that has not dreamed so once?

De Blénau gazed on her for a moment in silence. "Do you not speak to me, Pauline?" said he at length. "Or is it that you do not know me? True, true! years work a great change at our time of life. But I had fancied—perhaps foolishly fancied—that Pauline de Beaumont would know Claude de Blénau wheresoever they met, as well as De Blénau would know her."

While he spoke, Pauline knew not well what to do with her eyes; so she turned them towards the terrace, and they fell upon Mademoiselle de Hauteford, who was walking slowly along before the palace. Less things than that have caused greater events in this world than a renewal of all Pauline's doubts. Doubts, did I call them? Before Mademoiselle de Hauteford, with all the graceful dignity for which she was conspicuous, had taken three steps along the terrace, Pauline's doubts had become almost certainties; and turning round, with what she fancied to be great composure, she replied, "I have the pleasure of knowing you perfectly, Monsieur de Blénau; I hope you have recovered entirely from your late wounds."

"Monsieur de Blénau!—The pleasure of knowing me!" exclaimed the count. "Good God! is this my reception? Not three months have gone, since your letters flattered me with the title of 'Dear Claude.' My wounds are better, Mademoiselle de Beaumont, but you seem inclined to inflict others of a more painful nature."

Pauline strove to be composed, and strove to reply, but it was all in vain; nature would have way, and she burst into tears and sobbed aloud. "Pauline, dearest Pauline!" cried De Blénau, catching her to his bosom unrepelled: "This must be some mistake—calm yourself, dear girl, and, in the name of heaven, tell me, what means this conduct to one who loves you as I do?"

"One who loves me, Claude!" replied Pauline, wiping the tears from her eyes: "Oh no, no! But what right had I to think that you would love me? None, none I will allow. Separated from each other so long, I had no title to suppose that you would ever think of the child to whom you were betrothed, but of whom you were afterwards commanded not to entertain a remembrance—would think of her, after those engagements were broken by a power you could not choose but obey. But still, De Blénau, you should not have written those letters filled with professions of regard, and vows to retain the engagements your father had formed for you, notwithstanding the ~~new~~ obstacles which had arisen. You should not, indeed, unless you had been very sure of your own heart; for it was cruelly trifling with mine," and she gently disengaged herself from his arms. "I only blame you," she added, "for ever trying to gain my affections, and not for now being wanting in love to a person you have never seen since she was a child."

"Never seen you!" replied De Blénau with a smile: "Pauline, you are as mistaken in that, as, in any doubt you have of me. A year has not passed since last we met. Remember that summer sunset on the banks of the Rhone, remember the masked cavalier who gave you the ring now on your finger; remember the warm hills of Languedoc, glowing with a blush only equalled by your cheek, when he told you that that token was sent by one who loved you dearly, and would love you ever; that it came from Claude de Blénau, who had bid him place the ring on your finger, and a kiss on your hand, and renew the vow that he had long before pledged to you. Pauline, Pauline, it was himself."

"But why, dear Claude," demanded Pauline eagerly, forgetting coldness, and pride, and suspicion, in the memory his words called up, "why did you not tell me? why did you not let me know that it was you?"

"Because if I had been discovered," answered the count, "it might have cost me my life, years of imprisonment in the Bastille, or worse—the destruction of her I loved! The slightest cry of surprise from you might have betrayed me."

"But how did you escape without your journey being known?" demanded Pauline. "They say in Languedoc, that the cardinal has bribed the evil spirits of the air to be his spies on men's actions."

"It is difficult indeed to say how he acquires his information," replied De Blènaù; "but, however, I passed undiscovered. It was thus it happened: I had gone as a volunteer to the siege of Perpignan, or rather, as one of the Arrière-ban of Languedoc, which was led by the young and gallant Duc d'Enghien, to whom, after a long resistance, that city delivered its keys. As soon as the place had surrendered, I asked permission to absent myself for a few days. His highness granted it immediately, and I set out. For what think you, Pauline? what, but to visit that spot, round which all the hopes of my heart, all the dreams of my imagination, had hovered for many a year. But to proceed: taking the two first stages of my journey towards Paris, I suddenly changed my course, and embarking on the Rhone, descended as far as the Chateau de Beaumont. You remember that my page, Henry La Mothe, is the son of your mother's fermier, old La Mothe, and doubtless know full well his house among the oaks, on the borders of the great wood. It was here I took up my abode, and formed a thousand plans of seeing you undiscovered. At length fortune favoured me. Oh! how my heart beat as, standing by one of the trees in the long avenue, Henry first pointed out to me two figures coming slowly down the path from the chateau—yourself and your mother; and as, approaching towards me, they gradually grew more and more distinct, my impatience almost overpowered me, and I believe I should have started forward to meet you, had not Henry reminded me of the danger. You passed close by. O Pauline! I had indulged many a waking dream; I had let fancy deck you in a thousand imaginary graces, but at that moment, I found all I had imagined, or dreamed, a thousand times excelled. I found the beautiful girl, that had been torn from me so many years before, grown into woman's most surpassing loveliness; and the charms which fancy and memory had scattered from their united stores, faded away before the reality, like stars on the rising of the sun. But this was not enough. I watched my opportunity. I saw you as you walked alone on the terrace, by the side of the glittering Rhone,—I spoke to you,—I heard the tones of a voice to be remembered for many an after hour, and, placing the pledge of my affection on your hand, I tore myself away."

De Blénau paused. Insensibly, whilst he was speaking, Pauline had suffered his arm again to glide round her waist. Her hand somehow became clasped in his, and as he told the tale of his affection, the tears of many a mingled emotion rolled over the dark lashes of her eye, and chasing one another down her cheek, fell upon the lip of her lover, as he pressed a kiss upon the warm sunny spot which those drops bedewed.

De Blénau saw that those tears were no longer tears of sorrow, and had love been with him an art, he probably would have sought no farther; for in the whole economy of life, but more especially in that soft passion love, holds good the homely maxim, to let well alone. But De Blénau was not satisfied; and like a foolish youth he 'ceased Pauline to know why she had at first received him coldly. In good truth, she had by this time forgotten all about it; but as she was obliged to answer, she soon again conjured up all her doubts and suspicions. She hesitated, drew her hand from that of the count, blushed deeper and deeper, and twice began to speak without ending her sentence.

"I know not what to think," said she at length. "De Blénau, I would fain believe you to be all you seem; I would fain reject every doubt of what you say."

Her coldness, her hesitation, her embarrassment, alarmed De Blénau's fears, and he too began to be suspicious.

"On what can you rest a doubt?" demanded he, with a look of bitter mortification; and perceiving that she still paused, he added sadly, but coldly, "Mademoiselle de Beaumont, you are unkind. Can it be that you are attached to another? Say, am I so unhappy?"

"No, De Blénau, no!" replied Pauline, struggling for firmness: "but answer me one question, explain to me but this one thing, and I am satisfied."

"Ask me any question, propose to me any doubts," answered the count, "and I will reply truly, upon my honour."

"Then tell me," said Pauline — But just as she was about to proceed, she felt some difficulty in proposing her doubts. She had a thousand times before convinced herself they were very serious and well founded; but all jealous suspicions look so very foolish in black and white, or what is quite as good, in plain language, though they may seem very respectable when seen through the magnifying twilight of passion, that Pauline knew not very well how to give utterance to hers. "Then tell me," said Pauline, with no small hesitation—"then tell me, what was the reason you would suffer no one to open your hunting-coat, when you were wounded in the forest—no, not even to stanch the bleeding of your side?"

"There was a reason, certainly," replied De Blénau, not very well perceiving the connexion between his hunting-coat and Pauline's coldness; "there was a reason certainly; but how in the name of heaven does that affect you, Pauline?"

"You shall see by my next question," answered she. "Have you or have you not received a letter, privately conveyed to you from a lady? and has not Mademoiselle de Hauteford visited you secretly during your illness?"

It was now De Blénau's turn to become embarrassed; he faltered, and looked confused, and for a moment his cheek, which had hitherto been pale with the loss of blood, became of the deepest crimson, while he replied, "I did not know that I was so watched."

"It is enough, Monsieur de Blénau," said Pauline, rising, her doubts almost aggravated to certainties. "To justify myself, sir, I will tell you that you have not been watched. Pauline de Beaumont would consider that man unworthy of her affection, whose conduct would require watching. What I know, has come to my ears by mere accident. In fact," and her voice trembled the more, perhaps, that she strove to preserve its steadiness—"in fact, I have become acquainted with a painful truth through my too great kindness for you, in sending my own servant to inquire after your health, and not to watch you, Monsieur de Blénau."

"Stop, stop, Pauline! in pity, stop," cried De Blénau, seeing her about to depart. "Your questions place me in the most embarrassing of situations. But, on my soul, I have never suffered a thought to stray from you, and you yourself will one day do me justice. But at present, on this point, I am bound by every principle of duty and honour not to attempt an exculpation."

"None is necessary, Monsieur de Blénau," replied Pauline. "It is much better to understand each other at once. I have no right to any control over you. You are of course free, and at liberty to follow the bent of your own inclinations. Adieu! I shall always wish your welfare." And she was quitting the apartment, but De Blénau still detained her, though she gently strove to withdraw her hand.

"Yet one moment, Pauline," said he. "You were once kind, you were once generous, you have more than once assured me of your affection. Now, tell me, did you bestow that affection on a man destitute of honour? on a man who would sully his fame by pledging his faith to what was false?" Pauline's hand remained in his without an effort, and he went on. "I now pledge you my faith, and give you my honour—faith never broken—honour never stained—that however strange it may appear a lady should visit me in private, I have never loved or sought any but yourself. Pauline, do you doubt me now?"

Her eyes were fixed upon the ground, and she did not reply, but there was a slight motion in the hand he held, as if it would fain have returned his pressure had she dared. "I could," he continued, "within an hour obtain permission to explain it all. But oh, Pauline, how much happier would it make me to find, that you trust alone to my word—that you put full confidence in a heart that loves you!"

"I do! I do!" exclaimed Pauline, with all her own wild energy, at the same time placing her other hand also on his, and raising her eyes to his face. "Say no more, De Blénau. I believe I have been wrong; at all events, I cannot, I will not doubt, what makes me so happy to believe." And her eyes, which again filled with tears, were hidden on his bosom.

De Blénau pressed her to his heart, and again and again thanked the lips that had spoken such kind words, in the way that such lips may best be thanked. "Dearest Pauline!" said De Blénau, after enjoying a moment or two of that peculiar happiness which shines but once or twice even in the brightest existence, giving a momentary taste of heaven, and then losing itself, either in human cares, or less vivid joys.—The heart is a garden, and youth is its spring, and hope is its sunshine, and love is a thorny plant, that grows up and bears one bright flower, which has nothing like it in all the earth.

"Dearest Pauline," said De Blénau, "I leave you for a time,—that I may return and satisfy every doubt. Within one hour all shall be explained."

As he spoke, the door of the apartment opened, and one of the servants of the palace entered, with a face of some alarm. "Monsieur de Blénau," said he, "I beg a thousand pardons for intruding, but there have been, but now, at the palace gate, two men of the cardinal's guard inquiring for you: so I told them that you were most likely at the other side of the park, for—for—" and after hesitating a moment, he added, "they are the same who arrested Monsieur de Vitry."

De Blénau started. "Fly, fly, Claude!" exclaimed Pauline, catching him eagerly by the arm—"Oh fly, dear Claude, while there is yet time. I am sure they seek some evil towards you."

"You have done well," said De Blénau to the attendant; "I will speak to you as I come down.—Dearest Pauline," he continued when the man was gone "I must see what these gentlemen want. Nay, do not look frightened; you are mistaken about their errand. I have nothing to fear, believe me. Some trifling business, no doubt. In the mean time, I shall not neglect my original object. In half an hour all your doubts shall be satisfied."

"I have none, Claude," replied Pauline; "indeed I have none, but about these men."

De Blénau endeavoured to calm her, and assured her again and again that there was no danger. But Pauline was not easy, and the count himself had more suspicions concerning their object than he would suffer to appear.

CHAPTER IX.

IN front of the palace of St Germain's, but concealed from the park and terrace by an angle of the building, stood the Count de Chavigni, apparently engaged in the very undignified occupation of making love to a pretty-looking soubrette, no other than Louise, the waiting-maid of Mademoiselle de Beaumont. But, notwithstanding the careless nonchalance with which he affected to address her, it was evident that he had some deeper object in view than the trifling of an idle hour.

"Well, ma belle," said he, after a few words of a more tender nature, "you are sure the surgeon said, though the wound is in his side, his heart is uninjured?"

"Yes, exactly," said Louise, "word for word; and the queen answered, 'I understand you.' But I cannot think why you are so curious about it."

"Because I take an interest in the young count," replied Chavigni. "But his heart must be very hard if it can resist such eyes as yours."

"He never saw them," said Louise, "for I was not with my lady when they picked him up wounded in the forest."

"So much the better," replied Chavigni, "for that is he turning that angle of the palace. I must speak to him; so farewell, belle Louise, and remember the signal. Go through that door, and he will not see you."

Speaking thus, Chavigni left her, and a few steps brought him up to De Blénau, who at that moment traversed the angle in which he had been standing with Louise, and was hurrying on with a rapid pace in search of the queen.

"Good morrow, Monsieur de Blénau," said Chavigni; "you seem in haste."

"And am so, sir," replied De Blénau proudly; and added, after a moment's pause, "have you any commands for me?" for Chavigni stood directly in his way.

"None in particular," answered the other with perfect composure; "only, if you are seeking the queen, I will go with you to her majesty ; and as we proceed I will tell you a piece of news you may perhaps like to hear."

"Sir Count de Chavigni, I beg you would mark me," replied De Blènau. "You are one of the King's Council—a gentleman of good repute, and so forth ; but there is not that love between us that we should be seen taking our evening's walk together, unless, indeed, it were for the purpose of using our weapons more than our tongues."

"Indeed, Monsieur de Blènau," rejoined Chavigni, his lip curling into a smile which partook more of good humour than scorn, though, perhaps, mingled somewhat of each—"indeed you do not do me justice ; I love you better than you know, and may have an opportunity of doing you a good turn some day, whether you will or not. So, with your leave, I walk with you, for we both seek the queen."

De Blènau was provoked. "Must I tell you, sir," exclaimed he, "that your company is disagreeable to me ?—that I do not like the society of men who herd with robbers and assassins ?"

"Pshaw !" exclaimed Chavigni, somewhat peevishly. "Captious boy, you'll get yourself into the Bastille some day, where you would have been long ago had it not been for me."

"When you tell me, sir, how such obligations have been incurred," answered the count, "I shall be happy to acknowledge them."

"Why, twenty times, Monsieur de Blènau, you have nearly been put there," replied Chavigni, with that air of candour which it is very difficult to affect when it is not genuine. "Your hot and boiling spirit, sir, is always running you into danger. Notwithstanding all your late wounds, a little bleeding, even now, would not do you any harm. Here the first thing you do is to quarrel with a man who has served you, is disposed to serve you, and of whose service you may stand in need within five minutes."

"But to give you proof at once that what I advance is more than a mere jest—do you think that your romantic expedition to Languedoc escaped me ? Monsieur de Blènau, you start, as if you dreamed that in such a country as this, and under such an administration, any thing could take place without being known to some member of the government. No, no, sir! there are many people in France, even now, who think they are acting in perfect security, because no notice is apparently taken of the plans they are forming, or the intrigues they are carrying on; while, in reality, the hundred eyes of Policy are upon their every action, and the sword is only suspended over their heads, that it may eventually fall with more severity."

"You surprise me, I own," replied De Blénau, "by showing me that you are acquainted with an adventure, which I thought buried in my own bosom, or only confided to one equally faithful to me."

"You mean your page," said Chavigni, with the same easy tone in which he had spoken all along. "You have no cause to doubt him. He has never betrayed you (at least to my knowledge). But these things come about, very simply, without treachery on any part. The stag never flies so fast, nor the hare doubles so often, but they leave a scent behind them for the dogs to follow.—and so it is with the actions of man: conceal them as he will, there is always some trace by which they may be discovered; and it is no secret to any one, now-a-days, that there are people in every situation of life, in every town of France, paid to give information of all that happens; so that the schemes must be well concealed indeed, which some circumstance does not discover. I see you shake your head, as if you disapproved of the principle."

"De Blénau, you and I are engaged in different parties. You act firmly convinced of the rectitude of your own cause: do me the justice to believe that I do the same. You hate the minister—I admire him, and feel fully certain that all he does is for the good of the state. On the other hand, I applaud your courage, your devotion to the cause you have espoused, and your proud unbending spirit—and I would bring you to the scaffold to-morrow, if I thought it would really serve the party to which I am attached."

The interesting nature of his conversation, and the bold candour it displayed, had made De Blè nau tolerate Chavigni's society longer than he had intended, and even his dislike to the statesman had in a degree worn away before the easy dignity and frankness of his manner. But still, he did not like to be seen holding any kind of companionship with one of the queen's professed enemies; and, taking advantage of the first pause, he replied—

"You are frank, Monsieur de Chavigni, but my head is well where it is. And now may I ask to what does all this tend?"

"You need not hurry the conversation to a conclusion," replied Chavigni. "You see that we are in direct progress towards that part of the park where her majesty is most likely to be found." But seeing that De Blè nau seemed impatient of such reply, he proceeded: "However, as you wish to know to what my conversation tends, I will tell you. If you please, it tends to your own good. The cardinal wishes to see you——"

He paused, and glanced his eye over the countenance of his companion, from which, however, he could gather no reply, a slight frown being all the emotion that was visible.

Chavigni then proceeded. "The cardinal wishes to see you. He entertains some suspicion of you. If you will take my advice, you will set out for Paris immediately, wait upon his eminence, and be frank with him—Nay, do not start! I do not wish you to betray any one's secrets, or violate your own honour. But be wise, set out instantly."

"I suspected something of this," replied De Blè nau, "when I heard that there were strangers inquiring for me. But whatever I do, I must first see the queen:" and observing that Chavigni was about to offer some opposition, he added decidedly, "It is absolutely necessary—on business of importance."

"May I ask," said Chavigni, "is it of importance to her majesty or yourself?"

"I have no objection to answer that at once," replied De Blè nau: "it concerns myself alone."

"Stop a moment," cried Chavigni, laying his hand on the count's arm, and pausing in the middle of the avenue, at the farther extremity of which a group of three or four persons was seen approaching. "No business can be of more importance than that on which I advise you to go. Monsieur de Blénau, I would save you pain. Let me," once more, press you to set out without having any further conversation with her majesty than the mere etiquette of taking leave for a day."

De Blénau well knew the danger which he incurred, but still he could not resolve to go without clearing the doubts of Pauline, which five minutes' conversation with the queen would enable him to do. "It is impossible," replied he, thoughtfully; "besides, let the cardinal send for me. I do not see why I should walk with my eyes open into the den of a lion."

"Well then, sir," answered Chavigni, with somewhat more of coldness in his manner, "I must tell you, his eminence has sent for you, and that, perhaps, in a way which may not suit the pride of your disposition. Do you see those three men that are coming down the avenue? they are not here without an object. Come, once more, what say you, Monsieur le Comte? Go with me, to take leave of the queen, for I must suffer no private conversation. Let us then mount our horses, and ride as friends to Paris. There pay your respects to the cardinal, and take Chavigni's word, that, unless you suffer the heat of your temper to betray you into any thing unbecoming, you shall return safe to St. Germain's before to-morrow evening. If not, things must take their course."

"You offer me fair, sir," replied the count, "if I understand you rightly, that the cardinal has sent to arrest me; and, of course, I cannot hesitate to accept your proposal. I have no particular partiality for the Bastille, I can assure you."

"Then you consent?" said Chavigni. De Blénau bowed his head. "Well, then, I will speak to these gentlemen," he added, "and they will give us their room."

By this time the three persons, who had continued to advance down the avenue, had approached within the distance of a few paces of Chavigni and the count.

Two of them were dressed in the uniform of the cardinal's guard; one as a simple trooper, the other being the lieutenant who bore the lettre de cachet for the arrest of De Blénau. The third, we have had some occasion to notice in the wood of Mantes, being no other than the tall Norman, who on that occasion was found in a rusty buff jerkin, consorting with the banditti. His appearance, however, was now very much changed for the better. The neat trimming of his beard and mustaches, the smart turn of his broad beaver, the flush newness of his long-waisted blue silk vest, and even the hanging of his rapier, which, instead of offering its hilt on the left hip, ever ready for the hand, now swung far behind, with the tip of the scabbard striking against the right calf,—all denoted a change of trade and circumstances, from the poor bravo who won his daily meal at the sword's point, to the well-paid bully, who fattened at his lord's second table, on the merit of services more real than apparent.

De Blénau's eye fixed full upon the Norman, certain that he had seen him somewhere before, but the change of dress and circumstances embarrassed his recollection.

In the mean while, Chavigni advanced to the cardinal's officer. "Monsieur Chauville," said he, "favour me by preceding me to his Eminence of Richelieu. Offer him my salutation, and inform him, that Monsieur le Comte de Blénau and myself intend to wait upon him this afternoon."

Chauville bowed, and passed on, while the Norman, uncovering his head to Chavigni, instantly brought back to the mind of De Blénau the circumstances under which he had first seen him.

"You have returned, I see," said Chavigni. "Have you found an occasion of fulfilling my orders?"

"To your heart's content, monseigneur," replied the Norman; "never was such an astrologer, since the days of Intrim of Blois."

"Hush," said Chavigni, for the other spoke aloud. "If you have done it, that is enough. But for a time, keep yourself to Paris, and avoid the court, as some one may recognise you, even in these fine new feathers."

"Oh, I defy them," replied the Norman, in a lower tone than he had formerly spoken, but still so loud that De Blè nau could not avoid hearing the greater part of what he said—"I defy them; for I was so wrapped up in my black robes and my white beard, that the devil himself would not know me for the same mortal in the two costumes. But I hope, Monsieur le Comte, that my reward may be equal to the risk I have run, for they sought to stop me, and had I not been too good a necromancer for them, I suppose I should have been roasting at a stake by this time. But one wave of my magic wand sent the sword of Monsieur de Cinq Mars out of his hand, and opened me a passage to the wood; otherwise I should have fared but badly amongst them."

"You must not exact too much, Monsieur Marteville," replied Chavigni. "But we will speak of this to-night. I shall be in Paris in a few hours; at present, you see, I am occupied;" and leaving the Norman, he rejoined De Blè nau, and proceeded in search of the queen.

"If my memory serves me right, Monsieur de Chavigni," said de Blè nau, in a tone of some bitterness, "I have seen that gentleman before," and with his sword shining at my breast."

"It is very possible," answered Chavigni, with the most indifferent calmness. "I have seen him in the same situation with respect to myself."

"Indeed!" rejoined De Blè nau, with some surprise; "but probably not with the same intention," he added.

"I do not know," replied the statesman, with a smile. "His intentions in my favour were to run me through the body."

"And is it possible, then," exclaimed De Blè nau, "that, with such a knowledge of his character and habits, you can employ and patronise him?"

"Certainly," answered Chavigni, "I wanted a bold villain. Such men are very necessary in a state. Now I could not have better proof that this man had the qualities required, than his attempting to cut my throat. But you do him some injustice; he is better than you suppose—is not without feeling—and has his own ideas of honour."

Dé Blénau checked the bitter reply which was rising to his lips, and letting the conversation drop, they proceeded in silence in search of the queen. They had not gone much farther, when they perceived her leaning familiarly on the arm of Madame de Beaumont, and seemingly occupied in some conversation of deep interest. However, her eye fell upon the count and Chavigni as they came up, and, surprised to see them together, she abruptly paused in what she was saying.

"Look there, De Beaumont," said she: "something is not right. I have seen more than one of these creatures of the cardinal hanging about the park to-day. I fear for poor De Blénau. He has been too faithful to his queen to escape long."

"I salute your majesty," said Chavigni, as soon as they had come within a short distance of the queen, and not giving De Blénau the time to address her: "I have been the bearer of a message from his Eminence of Richelieu to Monsieur de Blénau, your majesty's chamberlain, requesting the pleasure of entertaining him for a day in Paris. The count has kindly accepted the invitation; and I have promised that the cardinal shall not press his stay beyond to-morrow. We only now want your majesty's permission and good leave, which, in his eminence's name, I humbly crave for Monsieur de Blénau."

"His eminence is too condescending," replied the queen. "He knows that his will is law; and we, humble kings and queens, as in duty, do him reverence. I doubt not that his intentions towards our chamberlain are as mild and amiable, as his general conduct towards ourself."

"The truth is, your majesty," said De Blénau, "the cardinal has sent for me, and (however Monsieur de Chavigni's politeness may colour it) in a way that compels my attendance."

"I thought so," exclaimed the queen, dropping the tone of irony which she had assumed towards Chavigni, and looking with mingled grief and kindness upon the young cavalier, whose destruction she deemed inevitable from the moment that Richelieu had fixed the serpent eyes of his policy upon him—"I thought so. Alas, my poor De Blénau! all that attach themselves to me seem devoted to persecution."

"Not so, your majesty," said Chavigni, with some degree of feeling; "I can assure you, Monsieur de Blénau goes at perfect liberty. He is under no arrest; and unless he stays by his own wish, will return to your majesty's court to-morrow night. The cardinal is far from seeking to give unnecessary pain."

"Talk not to me, Sir Counsellor," replied the queen, angrily: "Do I not know him? I, who of all the world have best cause to estimate his baseness? Have I not under his own hand, the proof of his criminal ambition? but no more of that——" And breaking off into Spanish as was frequently her custom when angry, she continued, "No sé si es la misma vanidad, la soberbia, ó la arrogancia, Que todo esto, según creo es el cardenal."

"It is useless, madam," said De Blénau, as soon as the queen paused in her angry vituperation of the minister, "to distress you further with this conversation. I know not what the cardinal wants, but he may rest assured that De Blénau's heart is firm, and that no human means shall induce him to swerve from his duty; and thus I humbly take my leave."

"Go then, De Blénau," said the queen. "Go, and whether we ever meet again or not, your faithful services and zealous friendship shall ever have my warmest gratitude; and Anne of Austria has no other reward to bestow." Thus saying, she held out her hand to him. De Blénau in silence bent his head respectfully over it, and turned away. Chavigni bowed low, and followed the count, to whose hotel they proceeded, in order to prepare for their departure.

In the commands which De Blénau gave on their first arrival, he merely desired the attendance of his page.

"Pardon me, Monsieur de Blénau, if I observe upon your arrangements," said Chavigni, when he heard this order. "But let me remind you, once more, that you are not going to a prison, and that it might be better if your general train attended you, as a gentleman of high station about to visit the Prime Minister of his sovereign. They will find plenty of accommodation in the Hotel de Bouthilliers."

"Be it so, then," replied De Blénau, scarcely able to assume even the appearance of civility towards his companion. "Henry de La Mothe," he proceeded, "order a dozen of my best men to attend me, bearing my full colours in their sword-knots and scarfs. Trick out my horses gaily, as if I were going to a wedding, for Claude de Blénau is about to visit the cardinal; and remember," he continued, his anger at the forced journey he was taking overcoming his prudence, "that there be saddled for my own use the good black barb that carried me so stoutly when I was attacked by assassins in the wood of Mantes; and, as he spoke, his eye glanced towards the statesman, who sitting in the window-seat, had taken up the Poems of Rotru, and apparently inattentive to all that was passing, read on with as careless and easy an air as if no more important interest occupied his thoughts, and no contending passions struggled in his breast.

CHAPTER X.

THOUGH the attendants of the Count de Blénau did not expend much time in preparing to accompany their master, the evening was nevertheless too far spent, before they could proceed, to permit the hope of reaching Paris ere the night should have set in. It was still quite light enough, however, to show all the preparations for the count's departure to the boys of St. Germain's, who had not beheld for many a good day such a gay cavalcade enliven the streets of that almost deserted town.

Chavigni and De Blénau mounted their horses together; and the four or five servants which the statesman had brought with him from Paris, mingling with those of De Blénau, followed the two gentlemen as they rode from the gate. Though another path might have been more agreeable to De Blè nau's feelings, Chavigni took his way immediately under the windows of the palace, thereby avoiding a considerable circuit, which would have occupied more time than they could well spare at that late hour of the evening.

The moment Pauline de Beaumont had seen her lover depart, the tears, which she had struggled to repress in his presence, flowed rapidly down her cheeks. The noble, candid manner of De Blè nau had nearly quelled all suspicion in her mind. The graces of his person, the tone of his voice, the glance of his eye, had realized the day-dreams which she had nourished from her youth.

Fame had long before told her that he was brave, high-spirited, chivalrous ; and his picture, as well as memory, had shown him as strikingly handsome ; but still it did not speak, it did not move ; and though Pauline had often sat with it in her hand, and imagined the expressions of his various letters as coming from those lips, or tried in fancy to animate the motionless eyes of the portrait, still the hero of her romance, like the figure of Prometheus ere he had robbed the sun of light to kindle it into active being, wanted the energy of real life. But at length they had met, and whether it was so in truth or whether she imagined it, matters not, but every bright dream of her fancy seemed fulfilled in De Blè nau ; and now that she had cause to fear for his safety, she upbraided herself for having entertained a suspicion.

She wept then, but her tears were from a very different cause to that which had occasioned them to flow before. Her eyes were still full, when a servant entered to inform her that the Queen desired her society, with the other ladies of her scanty court. Pauline endeavoured to efface the marks which her weeping had left, and slowly obeyed the summons, which being usual at that hour, she knew was on no business of import ; but on entering the closet, she perceived that tears had also been in the bright eyes of Anne of Austria.

The circle, which consisted of Madame de Beaumont, Mademoiselle de Haute ford, and another lady of honour, had drawn round the window at which her majesty sat, and which, thrown fully open, admitted the breeze from the park.

"Come hither, Pauline," said the queen, as she saw her enter: "What! have you been weeping too? Nay, do not blush, sweet girl; for surely a subject need not be ashamed of doing once what a Queen is obliged to do every day. Why, it is the only resource that we women have. But come here: there seems a gay cavalcade passing the gates. These are the toys with which we are taught to amuse ourselves. Who are they, I wonder? Comenear me, Pauline, and see if your young eyes can tell."

Pauline approached the window, and took her station by the side of the queen, who, rising from her seat, placed her arm kindly through that of Mademoiselle de Beaumont, and leaning gently upon her, prevented the possibility of her retiring from the spot where she stood.

In the mean while the cavalcade approached. The gay trappings of the horses, and the rich suits of their riders, with their silk scarfs and sword-knots of blue and gold, soon showed to the keen eyes of the queen's ladies that the young Count de Blénau was one of the party; while every now and then a horseman in Isabel and silver appearing among the rest, told them, to their no small surprise, that he was accompanied by the Count de Chavigni, the sworn friend of Richelieu, and one of the principal leaders of the cardinal's party. The queen, however, evinced no astonishment, and her attendants of course did not attempt to express the wonder they felt at such a companionship.

The rapid pace at which the two gentlemen proceeded, soon brought them near the palace; and Chavigni, from whose observant eye nothing passed without notice, instantly perceived the Queen and her party at the window, and marked his salutation with a profound inclination, low almost to servility; while De Blénau raised his high-plumed hat and bowed, with the dignity of one conscious that he had deserved well of all who saw him.

Chavigni led the way to Marly, and thence to Ruel, where night began to come heavily upon the twilight; and long before they entered Paris all objects were lost in darkness. "You must be my guest for to night, Monsieur de Blènu," said Chavigni, as they rode on down the Rue St. Honoré, "for it will be too late to visit the cardinal this evening."

However, as they passed the Palais Royal (then called the Palais Cardinal), the blaze of light which proceeded from every window of the edifice, told that on that night the superb minister entertained the court; a court, of which he had deprived his king, and which he had appropriated to himself. De Blènu drew a deep sigh as he gazed upon the magnificent edifice, and compared the pomp and luxury which every thing appertaining to it displayed, with the silent, desolate melancholy which reigned in the royal palaces of France.

Passing on down the Rue St. Honoré, and crossing the Rue St. Martin, they soon reached the Place Royale, in which Chavigni had fixed his residence. Two of De Blènu's servants immediately placed themselves at the head of his horse, and held the bridle short, while Henry de La Mothe sprang to the stirrup. But at that moment a gentleman, who seemed to have been waiting the arrival of the travellers, issued from the Hotel de Bouthilliers, and prevented them from dismounting.

"Do not alight, gentlemen," exclaimed he; "his eminence the Cardinal de Richelieu has sent me to request that Messieurs de Blènu and Chavigni will partake a small collation at the Palais Cardinal, without the ceremony of changing their dress."

De Blènu would fain have excused himself, alleging that the habit which he wore was but suited to the morning, and also was soiled with the dust of their long ride. But the cardinal's officer overbore all opposition, declaring that his eminence would regard it as a higher compliment, if the count would refrain from setting foot to the ground till he entered the gates of his palace.

"Then we must go back," said Chavigni. "We are honoured by the cardinal's invitation. Monsieur de Blènu, pardon me for having brought you so far wrong. "Go in, Chatenay," he added turning to one of his own domestics, "and order flambeaux."

In a few moments all was ready; and preceded by half a dozen torch-bearers on foot, they once more turned towards the dwelling of the minister. As they did so, D. Blénau's feelings were not of the most agreeable nature; but he acquiesced in silence, for to have refused his presence would have been worse than useless.

The Palais Royal, which, as we have said, was then called the Palais Cardinal, was a very different building when occupied by the haughty minister of Louis the Thirteenth, from that which we have seen it in our days. The unbounded resources within his power gave to Richelieu the means of lavishing on the mansion which he erected for himself, all that art could produce of elegant, and all that wealth could supply of magnificent. For seven years the famous Le Mercier laboured to perfect it as a building; and during his long administration, the cardinal himself never ceased to decorate it with every thing rare or luxurious. The large space of ground which it covered was divided into an outer and an inner court, round which, on every side, the superb range of buildings, forming the palace, was placed in exact and beautiful proportion, presenting an external and internal front, decorated with all the splendour of architectural ornament.

The principal façade lay towards the Rue St. Honoré, and another of simpler, but perhaps more correct design, towards the gardens, which last were of themselves one of the wonders of Paris at one time. Extending over the space now occupied by the Rue de Richelieu, the Rue de Valois, and several other streets, they contained, within themselves, many acres of ground, and were filled with every plant and flower that Europe then possessed. These were scattered about amongst the trees, which being planted long before the formality of the Dutch taste was introduced in France, had in general been allowed to fall into natural groups, unperverted into the long avenues and straight alleys which disfigure so many of the royal parks and gardens on the continent.

The right wing of the first court was principally occupied by that beautiful theatre, so strongly connected with every classic remembrance of the French stage, in which the first tragedies of Rotrou and Corneille were produced, in which many of the inimitable comedies of Molière were first given to the world, and in which he himself acted till his death.

In the wing immediately opposite was the chapel built in the Ionic order, and ornamented in that pure and simple manner which none knew better how to value than the Cardinal de Richelieu.

The two courts were divided from each other by a massive pile of building, containing the grand saloon, the audience-chamber, and the cabinet of the high council. On the ground-floor was the banqueting-room and its antechamber; and a great part of the building fronting the gardens was occupied by the famous gallery of portraits, which Richelieu had taken care should comprise the best pictures that could be procured of all the greatest characters in French history.

The rest of the palace was filled with various suites of apartments, generally decorated and furnished in the most sumptuous manner. Great part of these the cardinal reserved either for public entertainments, or for his own private use; but what remained was nevertheless fully large enough to contain that host of officers and attendants by which he was usually surrounded.

On the evening in question almost every part of that immense building was thrown open to receive the multitude that interest and fear gathered round the powerful and vindictive minister. Almost all that was gay, almost all that was beautiful, had been assembled there. All to whom rank gave something to secure; all to whom rank gave something to maintain; all whom wit rendered anxious for distinction; all whom talent prompted to ambition. Equally those that Richelieu feared or loved, hated or admired, were brought there by some means, and for some reason.

The scenes which met the eyes of De Blénau and Chavigni, as they ascended the grand staircase and entered the saloon, can only be qualified by the word princely. The blaze of jewels, the glare of innumerable lights, the splendid dresses of the guests, and the magnificent decorations of the apartments themselves, all harmonized together, and formed a coup d'œil of surpassing brilliancy.

The rooms were full, but not crowded: for there were attendants stationed in various parts for the purpose of requesting the visitors to proceed, whenever they observed too many collected in one spot. Yet care was taken that those who were thus treated with scant ceremony should be of the inferior class admitted to the cardinal's fête. Each officer of the minister's household was well instructed to know the just value of every guest, and how far he was to be courted, either for his mind or influence.

To render to all the highest respect, was the general order, but some were to be distinguished. Pains also were taken that none should be neglected, and an infinite number of servants were seen gliding through the apartments, offering the most costly and delicate refreshments to every individual of the mixed assembly.

De Blénau followed Chavigni through the grand saloon, where many an eye was turned upon the elegant and manly figure of him who, on that night of splendour and finery, presumed to show himself in a suit rich indeed and well-fashioned, but evidently intended more for the sports of the morning than for the gay evening circle in which he then stood. Yet it was remarked that none of the ladies drew back as the cavalier passed them, notwithstanding his riding-dress and his dusty boots; and one fair demoiselle, whose rank would have sanctioned it, had it been done on purpose, was unfortunate enough to entangle her train on his spurs. The Count de Coligni stepped forward to disengage it, but De Blénau himself had already bent one knee to the ground, and easily freeing the spur from the robe of Mademoiselle de Bourbon, he remained for a moment in the same attitude. "It is but just," said he, "that I should kneel, at once to repair my awkwardness, and sue for pardon."

"It was my sister's own fault, De Blénau," said the Duke d'Enghien, approaching them, and embracing the young count. "We have not met, dear friend, since the rendering of Perpignan. But what makes you here? Does your proud spirit bend at last to ask a grace of my Lord Uncle Cardinal?"

"No, your highness," replied de Blénau; "no further grace have I to ask, than leave to return to St. Germain's as soon as I may."

"What!" said the duke, in the abrupt heedless manner in which he always spoke, "does he threaten you too with that cursed bugbear of a Bastille? a bugbear that makes one man fly his country, and another betray it; that makes one man run his sword into his heart, and another marry;"—alluding without ceremony to his own compelled espousal of the cardinal's niece. "But there stands Chavigni," he continued, "waiting for you, I suppose. Go on, go on: there is no stopping when once you have got within the cardinal's magic circle. Go on, and God speed your suit; for the sooner you are out of that same circle the better."

Quitting the young hero, who had already, on more than one occasion, displayed that valour and conduct which in after-years procured for him the immortal name of the Great Condé, the Count de Blénau passed another group, consisting of the beautiful Madame de Montbazou and her avowed lover, the Duke of Longueville, who soon after, notwithstanding his unconcealed passion for another, became the husband of Mademoiselle de Bourbon; for be it remarked, in those days, a bitter quarrel existed between love and marriage, and they were seldom seen together in the same society. It is said, indeed, that in France a coolness remains between them to this day. Here also was the Duke of Guise, who afterwards played so conspicuous a part in the revolution of Naples, and by his singular adventures, his gallantry and chivalrous courage, acquired the name of l'Hero de la Fable, as Condé had been called l'Hero de l'Histoire. Still passing on, De Blénau rejoined Chavigni, who waited for him at the entrance of the next chamber.

It was the great hall of audience, and at the farther extremity stood the Cardinal de Richelieu himself, leaning for support against a gilt railing, which defended from any injurious touch the beautiful picture of Raphael, so well known by the title of "La Belle Jardinière." He was dressed in the long purple robes of his order, and wore the peculiar hat of a cardinal; the bright colour of which made the deadly hue of his complexion look still more ghastly. But the paleness of his countenance, and a certain attenuation of feature, was all that could be discerned of the illness from which he suffered. The powerful mind within seemed to conquer the feebleness of the body. His form was erect and dignified, his eye beaming with that piercing sagacity and haughty confidence in his own powers, which so distinguished his policy; and his voice, clear, deep, and firm, but of that peculiar quality of sound, that it seemed to spread all round, and to come no-one knew from whence, like the wind echoing through an empty cavern.

It was long since De Blénau had seen the cardinal; and on entering the audience-chamber, the sound of that voice made him start. Its clear hollow tone seemed close to him, though Richelieu was conversing with some of his immediate friends at the farther end of the room.

As the two cavaliers advanced, De Blénau had an opportunity of observing the manner in which the minister treated those around him: but far from telling aught of dungeons and of death, his conversation seemed cheerful, and his demeanour mild and placid. "And can this be the man," thought the count, "the fabric of whose power is cemented by blood and torture?"

Having now approached within a few paces of the spot where the cardinal stood, the figure of Chavigni caught his eye, and advancing a step, he received him with unaffected kindness. Towards De Blénau, his manner was full of elegant politeness. He did not embrace him as he had done Chavigni; but he held him by the hand for a moment, gazing on him with a dignified approving smile. Those who did not well know the heart of the subtle minister, would have called that smile benevolent, especially when it was accompanied by many kind inquiries respecting the young nobleman's views and pursuits. De Blénau had been taught to judge by actions, not professions; and the cardinal had taken care to imprint his deeds too deeply in the minds of men to be wiped out by soft words. To dissemble was not De Blénau's forte; and yet he knew, that to show a deceiver he cannot deceive, is to make him an open enemy for ever. He replied, therefore, calmly and politely; neither repulsed the cardinal's advances, nor courted his regard; and after a few more moments of desultory conversation, prepared to pursue his way through the various apartments.

"There are some men, Monsieur le Comte," said the cardinal, seeing him about to pass on, "whom I might have scrupled to invite to such a scene as this, in their riding-dress. But the Count de Blénau is not to be mistaken."

"I felt no scruple," answered De Blénau, "in presenting myself thus, when your eminence desired it; for the dress in which the Cardinal de Richelieu thought fit to receive me, could not be objected to by any of his circle."

The cardinal bowed; and De Blénau adding, that he would not intrude further at that moment, took his way through the suite of apartments to Richelieu's left hand. Chavigni, was about to follow, but a sign from the cardinal stopped him, and the young count passed on alone.

Each of the various rooms he entered was thronged with its own peculiar groups. In one, was an assembly of famous artists and sculptors; in another, a close convocation of philosophers, discussing a thousand absurd theories of the day; and in the last he came to, was a buzzing hive of poets and beaux esprits; each trying to distinguish himself, each jealous of the other, and all equally vain and full of themselves.

In one corner was Scuderi, haranguing upon the nature of tragedy, of which he knew nothing. In another place Voiture, throwing off little empty couplets and bon-mots like a child blowing bubbles from a tobacco-pipe; and farther on was Rotrou, surrounded by a select party more silent than the rest, to whom he recited some of his unpublished poems, marking strongly the verse, and laying great emphasis upon the rhyme. De Blénau stopped for a moment to listen while the poet proceeded:—

" L'aube desis se leve, et le mignard Zéphire
 Parfumant l'horizon du doux air qu'il respire,
 Va d'un son agréable eaveiller les oiseaux
 Jour saluer le jour qui paroist sur les eaux."

But though the verses he recited were highly poetic, the extravagant affectation of his manner soon neutralized their effect upon De Blénau; and passing on down a broad flight of steps, De Blénau found himself in the gardens of the palace. These, as well as the whole front of the building, were illuminated in every direction. Bands of musicians were dispersed in the different walks, and a multitude of servants were busily engaged in laying out tables for supper with all the choicest viands of the season, and in trimming the various lamps and tapers which hung from the branches of the trees or were displayed on fauciful frames of wood, so placed as to give the fullest light to the banquets which were situated near them.

Scattered about in various parts of the garden, but more especially near the palace, were different groups of gentlemen, all speaking of plays, assemblies, or fêtes, and all taking care to make their conversation perfectly audible, lest the jealous suspicion ever attendant on usurped power, should attribute to them schemes which, it is probable, fear alone prevented them from attempting.

Nevertheless, of the gardens, as we have said, containing several acres of ground, there were many parts comparatively deserted. It was towards these more secluded spots that De Blénau directed his steps, wishing himself many a league away from the Palais Cardinal and all its splendour. Just as he had reached a part where few persons were to be seen, some one struck him slightly on the arm, and turning round, he perceived a man who concealed the lower part of his face with his cloak, and tendered him what seemed to be a billet.

At the first glance De Blénau thought he recognised the Count de Coligni, a reputed lover of Mademoiselle de Bourbon, and imagined that the little piece of gallantry he had shown that lady on his first entrance, might have called upon him the wrath of the jealous Coligni. But no sooner had he taken the piece of paper, than the other darted away amongst the trees, giving him no time to observe more, either of his person or his dress.

Approaching a spot where the number of lamps gave him sufficient light to read, De Blè nau opened the note, which contained merely these words. "Beware of Chavigni;—they will seek to draw something from you which may criminate you hereafter."

As he read De Blè nau heard a light step advancing, and hastily concealing the note, turned to see who approached. The only person near was a lady, who had thrown a thick veil over her head, which not only covered her face, but the upper part of her figure. She passed close by him, without turning her head, or by any other motion seeming to notice him; but as she did so, De Blè nau heard a low voice from under the veil, desiring him to follow. Gliding on, without pausing for a moment, the lady led the way to the very extreme of the garden. De Blè nau followed quick upon her steps, and as he did so, endeavoured to call to mind where he had seen that graceful and dignified figure before. At length the lady stopped, looked round for a moment, and raising her veil, discovered the lovely countenance of Mademoiselle de Bourbon.

"Monsieur de Blè nau," said the princess, "I have but one moment to tell you, that the cardinal and Chavigni are plotting the ruin of the queen; and they wish to force or persuade you to betray her. After you had left the cardinal, by chance I heard it proposed to arrest you even to-night; but Chavigni said, that he had given his word that you should return to St. Germain's to-morrow. Take care, therefore, of your conduct while here, and if you have any cause to fear, escape the moment you are at liberty. Fly to Flanders, and place yourself under the protection of Don Francisco de Mello."

"I have to return your highness a thousand thanks," replied De Blè nau; "but as far as innocence can give security, I have no reason to fear."

"Innocence is nothing here," rejoined the lady. "But you are the best judge, Monsieur de Blè nau. I sent Coligni to warn you, and taking an opportunity of escaping from the supper-table, came to request that you will offer my humble duty to the queen, and assure her that Marie de Bourbon is ever hers. But here is some one coming—Good God, it is Chavigni!"

As she spoke, Chavigni came rapidly upon them. Mademoiselle de Bourbon drew down her veil, and De Blénau placed himself between her and the statesman, who, affecting an excess of gaiety, totally foreign to his natural character, began to rally the count upon what he termed his gallantry. "So Monsieur de Blénau," cried he, "already paying your devoirs to our Parisian dames? Nay, I must offer my compliments to your fair lady on her conquest;" and he endeavoured to pass the count towards Mademoiselle de Bourbon.

De Blénau drew his sword. "Stand off, sir," exclaimed he, "or by Heaven you are a dead man!" And the point came flashing so near Chavigni's breast, that he was fain to start back a step or two. The lady seized the opportunity to pass him, for the palisade of the garden had prevented her escaping the other way. Chavigni attempted to follow, but De Blénau caught his arm, and held him with a grasp of iron.

"Not one step, sir!" cried he. "Monsieur de Chavigni, you have strangely forgot yourself. How is it you presume, sir, to interrupt my conversation with any one? And let me ask, what affair it is of yours if a lady chose to give me five minutes of her company even here! You have slackened your gallantry not a little."

"But was the cardinal's garden a place fitted for such love stories?" demanded Chavigni, feeling, at the same time, very sure that the conversation he had interrupted had not been of love; for in those days politics and faction divided the heart of a Frenchwoman with gallantry, and, instead of quarrelling for the empire of her breast, these apparently opposite passions went hand in hand together, and exempt from the more serious dangers incurred by the other sex in similar enterprises, women were often the most active agents and zealous partisans in the factions and conspiracies of the times.

It had been Chavigni's determination, on accompanying De Blénau to the Palais Cardinal, not to lose sight of his companion for a moment, in order that no communication might take place between him and any of the queen's party, till such time as the cardinal had personally interrogated him concerning the correspondence which they supposed that Anne of Austria carried on with his brother, Philip of Spain. Chavigni, however, had been stopped, as we have seen, by the cardinal himself, and detained for some time in conversation, the principal object of which was, the Count de Blénau himself, and the means of either persuading him by favour, or of driving him by fear, not only to abandon, but to betray the party he had espoused. The cardinal thought ambition would do all; Chavigni said that it would not move De Blénau; and thus the discussion was considerably prolonged.

As soon as Chavigni could liberate himself, he had hastened after the count, and found him as we have described. To have ascertained who was his companion, Chavigni would have risked his life; but now that she had escaped him, the matter was past recall; and willing again to throw De Blénau off his guard, he made some excuses for his intrusion, saying he had thought that the lady was not unknown to him.

"Well, well, let it drop," replied De Blénau, fully more desirous of avoiding further inquiries than Chavigni was of relinquishing them. "But the next time you come across me on such an occasion, beware of your heart's blood, Monsieur de Chavigni." And thus saying, he thrust back his sword into the scabbard.

Chavigni, however, was resolved not to lose sight of him again, and passing his arm through that of the count, "You are still too hot, Monsieur de Blénau," said he; "but nevertheless let us be friends again."

"As far as we ever were friends, sir," replied De Blénau. "The open difference of our principles in every respect, must always prevent our greatly assimilating."

Chavigni, however, kept to his purpose, and did not withdraw his arm from that of De Blénau, nor quit him again during the whole evening.

Whether the statesman suspected Mademoiselle de

Bourbon or not, matters little ; but on entering the banquet-room, where the principal guests were preparing to take their seats, they passed that lady with her brother and the Count de Coligni, and the eye of Chavigni glanced from the countenance of De Blè nau to hers. But they were both upon their guard, and not a look betrayed that they had met since De Blè nau's spur had been entangled in her train.

At that moment the master of the ceremonies exclaimed with a loud voice, "Place au Comte de Blè nau," and was conducting him to a seat higher than his rank entitled him to take, when his eye fell upon the old Marquis de Brion ; and with the deference due not only to his station but to his high military renown, De Blè nau drew back to give him precedence.

"Go on, go on, mon cher De Blè nau," said the old soldier ; and lowering his voice to a whisper, he added, "honest men like you and I are all out of place here ; so go on, and never mind. If it were in the field, we would strive which should be first, but here there is no knowing which end of the table is most honourable."

"Wherever it were, I should always be happy to follow Monsieur de Brion," replied De Blè nau ; "but as you will have it, so let it be." And following the master of the ceremonies, he was soon placed amongst the most distinguished guests, and within four or five seats of the cardinal. Like the spot before a heathen altar, it was always the place either of honour or sacrifice ; and De Blè nau scarcely knew which was to be his fate. At all events, the distinction which he met with, was by no means pleasing to him, and he remained in silence during the greater part of the banquet.

Every thing in the vast hall where they sat was magnificent beyond description. It was like one of those scenes in fairy romance, where supernatural powers lend their aid to dignify some human festival. All the apartment was as fully illuminated as if the broad sun had shone into it in his meridian glory ! yet not a single light was to be seen. Soft sounds of music also occasionally floated through the air, but never so loud as to interrupt the conversation.

At the table all was glitter, and splendour, and luxury ; and from the higher end at which De Blénau sat, the long perspective of the hall, decked out with all a mighty kingdom's wealth, and crowded with the gay, the bright, and the fair, offered an interminable view of beauty and magnificence.

I might describe the passing of the banquet, and the bright smiles that were given, and the bright things that were said. I might enlarge upon the crowd of domestics, the activity of the seneschals and officers, and tell of the splendour of the decorations. I might even introduce the famous court fool, L'Angeli, who stood behind the chair of his young lord the Duke d'Enghien. But no—a master's hand has given to the world so many splendid pictures of such scenes, that mine would seem but a feeble imitation. Let such things rest with Scott, whose magic wand has had power to call up the spirit of the past with as much truth, as if it were again substantially in being.

To pursue our theme, however. The Cardinal de Richelieu, who held in his hand the fate of all who sat around him, yielded to his guests the most marked attention, treating them with the profound humility of great pride ; trying to quell the fire of his eye, till it should become nothing but affability ; and to soften the deep tones of his voice, from the accent of command to an expression of gentle courtesy ; but notwithstanding all his efforts, a degree of that haughtiness with which the long habit of despotic rule had tinged his manners, would occasionally appear, and still show that it was the lord entertaining his vassals. His demeanour towards De Blénau, however, was all suavity and kindness. He addressed him several times in the most marked manner during the course of the banquet, and listened to his reply with one of those approving smiles, so sweet upon the lips of power.

De Blénau was not to be deceived, it is true. Yet, though he knew that kindness to be assumed on purpose to betray, and the smile to be as false as hell, there was a fascination in the distinction shown him, against which he could not wholly guard his heart. His brow unbent of its frown, and he entered into the gay conversation which was going on around ; but at that moment he observed the cardinal glance his eye towards Chavigni with a meaning smile.

De Blénau marked it. " So," thought he, " my lord cardinal, you deem me your own." And as the guests rose, De Blénau took his leave, and returned with Chavigni to the Place Royale.

CHAPTER XI.

THE music of the cardinal's fête rang in De Blénau's ears all night, the lights danced in his eyes, and the various guests flitted before his imagination, like the figures in some great phantasmagoria. One time he seemed wandering in the gardens with Pauline de Beaumont, and offering up all the dearest treasures of his heart, when suddenly the lady raised her veil, and it was Mademoiselle de Bourbon. Then again he was seated on the cardinal's right hand, who poured out for him a cup of wine : he raised it to his lips, and was about to drink, when some one dashed it from his hand, exclaiming " It is poison !" then turning round to see who had thus interposed he beheld a figure without a head, and the overthrown cup poured forth a stream of blood. The next moment it was all the cardinal's funeral, and the fool L'Angeli appeared as chief mourner. At length, however, towards the approach of morning, the uneasy visions died away, and left him in deep sleep, from which he rose refreshed, and prepared to encounter the events of a new day.

Alas ! that man should still rise to sorrow and to danger, and that the kindest gift of Heaven should be the temporary forgetfulness of existence. Sorrow ! how is it that thy coarse thread is so intimately mingled with the web of life, that he who would tear thee out must rend the whole fabric ? Oh life, thou long sad dream ! when shall we rise from all thy phantom agonies to that bright waking which we fondly hope ?

De Blénau prepared his mind, as a man arming for a battle, and sent to notify to Chavigni, that he was about to visit the cardinal. In a few minutes after, the statesman himself appeared, and courteously conducted the young count to his horse, but did not offer to accompany him to the minister. "Monsieur de Blénau," said he, "it is better you should go alone. After your audience, you will doubtless be in haste to return to St. Germain's; but if you will remain to take your noon meal at my poor table, I shall esteem myself honoured."

De Blénau thanked him for his courtesy, but declined, stating that he was anxious to reach home before night, if he were permitted to do so at all. "My word is passed for your safety," replied Chavigni; "so have no doubt on that head. But take my counsel, Monsieur le Comte: moderate your proud bearing towards the cardinal. Those who play with a lion, must take good care not to irritate him."

On arriving at the Palais Cardinal, De Blénau left his attendants in the outer court, and following an officer of the household, proceeded through a long suite of apartments to a large saloon, where he found several others waiting the leisure of the minister, who was at that moment engaged in conference with the Ambassador from Sweden.

De Blénau's own feelings were not of the most comfortable nature; but on looking round the room, he guessed, from the faces of all those with whom it was tenanted, that such sensations were but too common there. One had placed himself at a window, and gazed upon the stones of the courtyard with as much earnestness as if they had inspired him with the deepest interest. Another walked up and down his own corner with irregular steps and downcast look. Another leaned back in his seat, with his chin resting on his breast, and regarded intently a door in the other side of the saloon. And another sat bending his hat into so many shapes, that he left it, in the end, of no shape at all. But all were marked, by the knitted brow and anxious eye, for men whose fate was hanging on the breath of another.

There was nothing consolatory in their looks, and De

Blénau turned to the portraits which covered the walls of the saloon. The first that his eye fell upon was that of the famous Montmorency. He was represented as armed in steel, with the head uncovered; and from his apparent age it seemed that the picture had not been painted long before the unfortunate conspiracy, which, by its failure, brought him to the scaffold. There was also an expression of grave sadness in the countenance, as if he had presaged his approaching fate. De Blénau turned to another; but it so happened that each picture in the room represented some one of the many whom Richelieu's unsparing vengeance had overtaken. Whether they were placed in that waiting-room in order to overawe those whom the minister wished to intimidate; or whether it was that the famous gallery, which the cardinal had filled with portraits of all the principal historical characters of France, would contain no more, and that in consequence the pictures of the latter dates had been placed in this saloon, without any deeper intent, matters not; but at all events they offered no very pleasant subject of contemplation.

De Blénau, however, was not long kept in suspense; for, in a few minutes, the door on the other side of the room opened, and the Swedish Ambassador passed out. The door shut behind him, but in a moment after, an attendant entered, and although several others had been waiting before him, De Blénau was the first summoned to the presence of the cardinal.

He could not help feeling as if he wronged those he left still in doubt as to their fate: but following the officer through an ante-room, he entered the audience-closet, and immediately perceived Richelieu seated at a table, over which were strewn a multitude of papers of different dimensions, some of which he was busily engaged in examining;—reading them he was not, for his eye glanced so rapidly over their contents, that his knowledge of each could be but general. He paused for a moment as De Blénau entered, bowed his head, pointed to a seat, and resumed his employment. When he had done, he signed the papers, and gave them to a dull-looking personage, in a black silk pourpoint, who stood behind his chair.

"Take these three death-warrants," said he, "to Monsieur Lafemas, and then these others to Poterie at the Bastille.* But no—stop," he continued after a moment's thought; "you had better go to the Bastille first; for Poterie can put Caply to the torture, while you are gone to Lafemas, and you can bring me back his confession as you return."

De Blénau shuddered at the sang froid with which the minister commanded those things that make one's blood curdle even to imagine. But the attendant was practised in such commissions; and taking the packets, as a mere matter of course, he bowed in silence, and disappearing by a door on the other side, left De Blénau alone with the cardinal.

"Well, Monsieur de Blénau," said Richelieu, looking up with a frank smile, "your pardon for having detained you. There are many things upon which I have long wished to speak to you, and this caused me to desire your company. But I have no doubt that we shall part perfectly satisfied with each other."

The cardinal paused, as if for a reply. "I hope so too, my lord," said De Blénau. "I can, of course, have no cause to be dissatisfied with your eminence; and for my own part, I feel my bosom to be clear."

"I doubt it not, Monsieur le Comte," replied the minister, with a gracious inclination of the head—"I doubt it not; I know your spirit to be too frank and noble to mingle in petty faction and treasonable cabal. No one more admires your brave and independent bearing than myself. You must remember that I have marked you from your youth. You have been educated, as it were, under my own eye; and were't it now necessary to trust the welfare of the state to the honour of any one man, I would confide it to the honour of De Blénau."

"To what, in the name of Heaven can this lead?" thought De Blénau; but he bowed without reply, and the cardinal proceeded.

* The conduct of both Messrs. Lafemas and La Poterie may be found fully detailed, in the Mémoires of La Porte, from page 133 to page 188.

"I have, for some time past," he continued, "been thinking of placing you in one of those high stations to which your rank and consideration entitle you to aspire. At present, none are vacant; but as a forerunner to such advancement, I propose to call you to the council, and to give you the government of Poitou."

De Blénau was now, indeed, astonished. The cardinal was not a man to jest; and yet what he proposed, as a mere preliminary, was an offer that the first noble in France might have accepted with gladness. The count was about to speak, but Richelieu paused only for a moment, to observe the effect of what he said upon his auditor; and perhaps overrating the ambition of De Blénau, he proceeded more boldly.

"I do not pretend to say, notwithstanding my sense of your high merit, and my almost parental feelings towards you, that I am wholly moved to this by my individual regard; but the truth is, that the state requires, at this moment, the services of one, who joins to high talents a thorough knowledge of the affairs of Spain."

"So!" thought De Blénau, "I have it now. The government of Poitou, and a seat at the council, provided I betray the queen and sell my own honour." Richelieu seemed to wait an answer, and De Blénau replied: "If your eminence means to attribute such knowledge to me, some one must have greatly misled you. I possess no information on the affairs of Spain whatever, except from the common reports and journals of the time."

This reply did not seem to affect Richelieu's intentions. "Well, well, Monsieur de Blénau," said he with a smile, "you will take your seat at the council, and will, of course, as a good subject and honourable man, communicate to us whatever information you possess, on those points which concern the good of the state. We do not expect all at once; and every thing shall be done to smooth your way, and facilitate your views. Then, perhaps, if Richelieu lives to execute the plans he has formed, you, Monsieur de Blénau, following his path, and sharing his confidence, may be ready to take his place, when death shall at length call him from it."

The cardinal counted somewhat too much on De Blè nau's ambition, and not sufficiently on his knowledge of the world ; and imagining that he had, the evening before, discovered the weak point in the character of the young count, he thought to lead him to any thing, by holding out to him extravagant prospects of future greatness. The dish, however, was somewhat too highly flavoured ; and De Blè nau replied, with a smile,

" Your eminence is exceeding good to think at all of me, in the vast and more important projects which occupy your mind. But, alas ! my lord, De Blè nau would prove but a poor successor to Richelieu.—No, my lord cardinal," he continued, " I have no ambition ; that is a passion which should be reserved for such great and comprehensive minds as yours. I am contented as I am. High stations are always stations of danger."

" I had heard that the Count de Blè nau was no way fearful," said Richelieu, fixing on him a keen and almost scornful glance. " Was the report a mistake ? or is it lately he has become afraid of danger ?"

De Blè nau was piqued, and lost temper. " Of personal danger, my lord, I am never afraid," replied he. " But when along with risk to myself is involved danger to my friends, danger to my country, danger to my honour, and danger to my soul," and he returned the cardinal's glance full as proudly as it had been given, " then, my lord cardinal, I would say, it were no cowardice, but true courage to fly from such peril—unless," he added, remembering the folly of opposing the irritable and unscrupulous minister, and thinking that his words had, perhaps, been already too warm—" unless, indeed, one felt within one's breast the mind of a Richelieu."

While De Blè nau spoke, the cardinal's brow knitted into a frown. A flush too came over his cheek ; and untying the ribbon which served as a fastening, he took off the velvet cap he generally wore, as if to give himself air. He heard him, however, to the end, and then answered drily, " You speak well, Monsieur de Blè nau, and, I doubt not, feel what you say. But am I to understand that you refuse to aid us at the council with your information and advice?"

"So far, your eminence is right," replied the count, who saw that the storm was now about to break upon his head; "I must, indeed, decline the honours which you offer with so bountiful a hand. But do not suppose that I do so from unwillingness to yield you any information; for, truly, I have none to give. I have never meddled with politics. I have never turned my attention to state affairs; and therefore still less could I yield you any advice. Your eminence would be wofully disappointed, when you expected to find a man well acquainted with the arts of government, and deep read in the designs of foreign states, to meet with one, whose best knowledge is to range a battalion, or to pierce a boar;—a soldier, and not a diplomatist; a hunter, and not a statesman. And as to the government of Poitou, my lord, its only good would be the emolument, and already my revenues are far more than adequate to my wants."

"You refuse my kindness, sir," replied the cardinal, with an air of deep determined haughtiness, very different from the urbanity with which he had at first received De Blénau; "I must now speak to you in another tone. And let me warn you to beware of what you say; for be assured that I already possess sufficient information to confound you if you should prevaricate."

"My lord cardinal," replied De Blénau, somewhat hastily, "I am not accustomed to prevaricate. Ask any questions you please, and, so long as my honour and my duty go with them, I will answer you."

"Then there are questions," said the cardinal, "that you would think against your duty to answer?"

"I said not so, your eminence," replied De Blénau. "In the examination I find I am to undergo, give my words their full meaning, if you please, but no more than their meaning."

"Well then, sir, answer me as a man of honour and a French noble," said the cardinal,—“Are you not aware of a correspondence that has been, and is now, carried on between Anne of Austria, and Don Francisco de Mello, governor of the Low Countries?"

"I know not whom you mean, sir, by Anne of Austria," replied de Blénau. "If it be her majesty, your queen and mine, that you so designate, I reply at once that I know of no such correspondence, nor do I believe that it exists."

"Do you mean to say, Monsieur de Blénau," demanded the cardinal, fixing his keen sunken eyes upon the young count with that basilisk glance for which he was famous—"Do you mean to say, that you yourself have not forwarded letters from the queen to Madame de Chevreuse, and Don Francisco de Mello, by a private channel?—Pause, Monsieur de Blénau, before you answer, and be well assured that I am acquainted with every particular of your conduct."

"Your éminence is, no doubt, acquainted with much more intricate subjects than any of my actions," replied the count. "With regard to Madame de Chevreuse, her majesty has no need to conceal a correspondence with her, which has been fully permitted and sanctioned, both by your éminence and the still higher authority of the king; and I may add, that to my certain knowledge, letters have gone to that lady by your own courier. On the other point, I have answered already; and have only to say once more, that I know of no such correspondence, nor would I, assuredly, lend myself to any such measures, which I should conceive to be treasonable."

"I have always hitherto supposed you to be a man of honour," said the cardinal coolly; "but what must I conceive now, Monsieur le Comte, when I tell you that I have those very letters in my possession?"

"You may conceive what you please, sir," replied De Blénau, giving way to his indignation; "but I will dare any man to lay before me a letter from her majesty to the person you mention, which has passed through the hands of De Blénau."

The cardinal did not reply, but opening an ebony cabinet, which stood on his right hand, he took from one of the compartments a small bundle of papers, from which he selected one, and laid it on the table before the count, who had hitherto looked on with no small wonder and expectation. "Do you know that writing, sir?" demanded the cardinal, still keeping his hand upon the paper, in such a manner as to allow only a word or two to be visible.

De Blénau examined the line which the cardinal suffered to appear, and replied—"From what little I can see, I should imagine it to be the handwriting of her majesty. But that does not show that I have any thing to do with it."

"But there is that in it which does," answered Richelieu, folding down a line or two of the letter, and pointing out to the count a sentence which said, "This will be conveyed to you by the Count de Blénau, who you know never fails."

"Now, sir!" continued the cardinal, "once more let me advise you to give me all you possess upon this subject. From a feeling of personal regard, I have had too much patience with you already."

"All I can reply to your eminence," answered the count, not a little embarrassed, "is, that no letter whatever has been conveyed by me, knowingly, to the governor of the Low Countries."

De Blénau's eyes naturally fixed on the paper, which still lay on the table, and from which the cardinal had by this time withdrawn his hand; and feeling that both life and honour depended upon that document, he resolved to ascertain its authenticity, of which he entertained some doubt.

"Stop," said he hastily, "let me look at the superscription," and before Richelieu could reply, he had raised it from the table and turned to the address. One glance was enough to satisfy him, and he returned it to the cardinal with a cool and meaning smile, repeating the words—"To Madame de Chevreuse."

At first the cardinal had instinctively stretched out his hand to stop De Blénau in his purpose, but he instantly recovered himself, nor did his countenance betray the least change of feeling. "Well, sir," replied he, "you said that you would dare any one to lay before you a letter from the queen to the person I mentioned. Did I not mention Madame de Chevreuse, and is not there the letter?"

"Your eminence has mistaken me," replied De Blénau bowing his head, and smiling at the minister's art; "I meant, Don Francisco de Mello. I had answered what you said in regard to Madame de Chevreuse, before?"

"I did mistake you then, sir," said the cardinal; "but it was from the ambiguity of your own words. However, passing over your boldness, in raising that letter without my permission; I will show you that I know more of your proceedings than you suspect. I will tell you the very terms of the message you sent to the queen, after you were wounded in the wood of Mantes, conveying to her, that you had not lost the packet with which you were charged. Did not Seguin tell her, on your part, that though the wound was in your side, your heart was not injured?"

"I dare say he did, my lord," replied De Blénau coolly; "and the event has proved that he was quite right, for your eminence must perceive that I am quite recovered, which, of course, could not have been the case, had any vital part been hurt. But I hope, your eminence, that there is no offence, in your eyes, either in having sent the queen, my mistress, an account of my health, or in having escaped the attack of assassins."

A slight flush passed over Richelieu's cheek. "You may chance to fall into less scrupulous hands, than even theirs," replied he. "I am certainly informed, sir, that you, on the part of the queen, have been carrying on a treasonable intercourse with Spain—a country at war with France, to whose crown you are a born subject and vassal; and I have to tell you, that the punishment of such a crime is death. Yes, sir, you may knit your brow. But no consideration shall stay me from visiting, with the full severity of the law, such as do so offend; and though the information I want be but small, depend upon it, I shall not hesitate to employ the most powerful means to wring it from you."

De Blénau had no difficulty in comprehending the nature of those means, to which the cardinal alluded; but his mind was made up to suffer the worst. "My lord cardinal," replied he, " what your intentions are, I know not ; but be sure, that to whatever extremes you may go, you can wring nothing from me but what you have already heard. I once more assure you, that I know of no treasonable correspondence whatsoever ; and firm in my own innocence, I equally despise all attempts to bribe or to intimidate me."

" Sir, you are insolent !" replied the cardinal rising : " Use no such language to me !—Are you not an insect I can sweep from my path in an instant ? Ho, a guard there without ! We shall soon see, whether you know aught of Philip of Spain."

Had the cardinal's glance been directed towards De Blénau, he would have seen, that at the name of Philip of Spain, a degree of paleness came over his cheek ; but another object had caught Richelieu's eye, and he did not observe it. It was the entrance of the attendant whom he had despatched with the death-warrants, which now drew his notice ; and well pleased to show De Blénau the dreadful means he so unscrupulously employed to extort confession from those he suspected, he eagerly demanded, " What news ?"

" May it please your eminence," said the attendant, " Caply died under the torture. In truth, it was soon over with him, for he did not bear it above ten minutes."

" But the confession, the confession !" exclaimed Richelieu. " Where is the procès verbal ?"

" He made no confession, sir," replied the man. " He protested, to the last, his innocence, and that he knew nothing."

" Pshaw !" said Richelieu ; " they let him die too soon ; they should have given him wine to keep him up. Foolish idiot," he continued, as if meditating over the death of his victim ; " had he but told what he was commanded, he would have saved himself from a death of horror. Such is the meed of obstinacy."

" Such," thought De Blénau, " is, unhappily, often the reward of firmness and integrity. But such a death is honourable in itself."

No one could better read in the face what was passing in the mind than Richelieu, and it is probable that he easily saw in the countenance of De Blénau, the feelings excited by what had just passed. He remembered also the promise given by Chavigni; and if, when he called the guard, he had ever seriously proposed to arrest De Blénau, he abandoned his intention for the moment. Not that the high tone of the young count's language was either unfelt, or forgiven, for Richelieu never pardoned; but it was as easy to arrest De Blénau at St Germain's as in Paris; and the wily minister calculated that by giving him a little liberty, and throwing him off his guard, he might be tempted to do those things which would put him more completely in the power of the government, and give the means of punishing him for his pride and obstinacy, as it was internally termed by a man long unaccustomed to any opposition.

De Blénau was principally obnoxious to the cardinal, as the confidant of the queen, and from being the chief of her adherents both by his rank, wealth, and reputation. Anne of Austria having now become the only apparent object which could cloud the sky of Richelieu's political power, he had resolved either to destroy her, by driving her to some criminal act, or so to entangle her in his snares, as to reduce her to become a mere instrument in his hands and for his purposes. To arrest De Blénau would put the queen upon her guard; and therefore, the minister, without hesitation, resolved to dissemble his resentment, and allow the count to depart in peace; reserving for another time the vengeance he had determined should overtake him at last. Nor was his dissembling of that weak nature which those employ, who have all the will to deceive, without the art of deceiving.

Richelieu walked rapidly up and down the closet for a moment, as if striving to repress some strong emotion, then stopped, and turning to De Blénau with some frankness of manner, "Monsieur le Comte," said he, "I will own that you have heated me,—perhaps I have given way to it too much. But you ought to be more careful of your words, sir, and remember that with men whose power you cannot resist, it is sometimes dangerous even to be in the right, much more to make them feel it rudely. However, it is all past, and I will now detain you no longer; trusting to your word, that the information which I have received, is without foundation. Let me only add, that you might have raised yourself this day to the height which few men in France would not struggle to attain. But that is past also, and may, perhaps, never return."

"I am most grateful, believe me," replied De Blénau, "for all the favours your eminence intended me; and I have no doubt, that you will soon find some other person, on whom to bestow them, much more worthy of them than myself."

Richelieu bowed low, and fixed his eyes upon the count without reply—a signal that the audience was over, which was not lost upon De Blénau, who very gladly took his leave of the minister, hoping most devoutly never to see his face again. The ambiguity of his last sentence, however, had not escaped the cardinal.

"So, Monsieur de Blénau!" said he, as soon as the count had left him, "you can make speeches with a double meaning also! Can you so? You may rue it though, for I will find means to bend your proud spirit, or to break it; and that before three days be over. Is every thing prepared for my passage to Chantilly?" he continued, turning to the attendant.

"All is prepared, please your eminence," replied the man; "and as I passed, I saw Monsieur de Chavigni getting into his chaise to set out."

"We will let him be an hour or two in advance," said the cardinal. "Send in the Marquis de Goumont;" and he again applied himself to other affairs.

CHAPTER XII.

THE little village of Mesnil St. Loup, all insignificant as it is, was at the time of my tale a place of even less consequence than it appears nowadays, when nine people out of ten have scarcely ever heard of its existence.

It was, nevertheless, a pretty-looking place; and had its little auberge, on the same scale and in the same style as the village to which it belonged,—small, neat, and picturesque, with its high pole before the door, crowned with a gay garland of flowers, which served both for sign and inscription to the inn; being fully as comprehensible an intimation to the peasantry of the day, that “Bon vin et bonne chère” were to be obtained within, as the most artful flourish of a modern sign-painter.

True it is, that the little cabaret of Mesnil St. Loup was seldom troubled with the presence of a traveller; but there the country people would congregate after the labours of the day, and enjoy their simple sports with a relish that luxury knows not. The high-road from Paris to Troyes passed quite in another direction; and a stranger in Mesnil St. Loup was a far greater stranger there than he could possibly have been any where else—except perhaps in newly-discovered America. For there was nothing to excite either interest or curiosity; without it were the little church, which had seen many a century pass over its primitive walls, remaining still unaltered, while five or six old trees, which had been its companions from time out of mind, began to show strong signs of decay, in their rifted bark and fallen branches. Nevertheless, they still formed a picturesque group, with a great stone cross and fountain underneath them, and a seat for the weary traveller to rest himself in their shade.

Thus, Mesnil St. Loup was little known to strangers, for its simplicity had no attractions for the many. However, on one fine evening, somewhere about the beginning of September, the phenomenon of a new face showed itself at Mesnil St. Loup. The personage to whom it appertained, was a horseman of small mean appearance, who, having passed by the church, rode through the village to the auberge, and having raised his eyes to the garland over the door, he divined from it, that he himself would find there good Champagne wine, and his horse would meet with entertainment equally adapted to his peculiar taste. Thereupon, the stranger alighted and entered the place of public reception, without making any of that bustle about himself, which the landlord seemed well inclined to do for him; but on the contrary sat himself down in the most shady corner, ordered his bottle of wine, and inquired what means the house afforded of satisfying his hunger, in a low quiet tone of voice, which reached no farther than the person he addressed.

"As for wine," the host replied, "Monsieur should have such wine that the first merchant of Epernay might prick his ears at it; and in regard to eatables, what could be better than stewed eels, out of the river hard by, and a civet de lièvre?—Monsieur need not be afraid," he added; "it was a real hare he had snared that morning himself, in the forest under the hill. Some dishonourable innkeepers," he observed—"innkeepers unworthy of the name, would dress up cats and rats, and such animals, in the form of hares and rabbits; even as the devil had been known to assume the appearance of an angel of light; but he scorned such practices, and could not only show his hare's skin, but his hare in the skin. Further, he would give Monsieur an ortolan in a vine-leaf, and a dish of stewed sorrel."

The stranger underwent the innkeeper's oration with the most exemplary patience, signified his approbation of the proposed dinner, without attacking the hare's reputation; and when at length it was placed before him, he ate his meal and drank his wine in profound silence, without a word of praise or blame to either one or the other. The landlord, with all his sturdy loquacity, failed in more than one attempt to draw him into conversation; and the hostess, though none of the oldest or ugliest, could scarce win a syllable from his lips, even by asking if he were pleased with his fare. The taciturn stranger merely bowed his head, and seemed little inclined to exert his oratorical powers, more than by the simple demand of what he wanted; so that both mine host and hostess gave him up in despair—the one concluding that he was "an odu one," and the other declaring that he was as stupid as he was ugly.

This lasted some time, till one villager after another, having exhausted every excuse for staying to hear whether the stranger would open his lips, dropped away in his turn, and left the apartment vacant. It was then, and not till then, that mine host was somewhat surprised, by hearing the silent traveller pronounce in a most audible and imperative manner, "Gaultier, come here." The first cause of astonishment was to hear him speak at all; and the next to find his own proper name of Gaultier so familiar to the stranger, forgetting that it had been vociferated at least one hundred times that evening in his presence. However, Gaultier obeyed the summons with all speed, and approaching the stranger with a low reverence, begged to know his good will and pleasure.

"Your wine is good, Gaultier," said the stranger, raising his clear gray eyes to the rosy round of Gaultier's physiognomy. Even an innkeeper is susceptible of flattery; and Gaultier bent his head down towards the ground, as if he were going to do kou-tou.

"Gaultier, bring me another bottle," said the stranger. This phrase was better than the former; that sort of substantial flattery that goes straight to an innkeeper's heart. Truly, it is a pity that innkeepers are such selfish beings. And yet it is natural too;—so rapidly does mankind pass by them, that theirs can be, at best, but a stage-coach sort of affection for their fellow-creatures—The coachman shuts the door—Drive-on!—and it is all over. Thus I am afraid it is, in the giddy round of this rapid world's society; the gaieties, the care, and the bustle in which we live, render our hearts but as an inn, where many a traveller stays for an hour, pays his score, and is forgotten.

The bottle of wine was not long in making its appearance, and as Gaultier set it on the table before the stranger, he asked if he could serve him further.

"Can you show me the way to the old Chateau of St. Loup?" demanded the stranger.

"Surely, I can, sir," replied the innkeeper; "that is to say, as far as knowing where it is. But I hope Monsieur does not mean to-night."

"Indeed do I," answered the stranger; and pray why not? The night is the same as the day to an honest man."

"No doubt, no doubt!" exclaimed Gaultier, with the greatest doubt in the world in his own mind.—"No doubt! But, Holy Virgin! Jesu preserve us!"—and he signed the cross most devoutly—"we all know that there are spirits, and demons, and astrologers, and the devil, and all those sort of things; and I would not go through the grove where old Père le Rouge, the sorcerer, was burnt alive, not to be prime minister, or the Cardinal de Richelieu, or any other great man,—that is to say, after nightfall. In the day I would go any where, or do any thing,—I am no coward, sir,—I dare do any thing. My fathers served in the blessed league against the cursed Huguenots—so I am no coward;—but bless you, sir, I will tell you how it happened, and then you will see—"

"I know all about it," replied the stranger, in a voice that made the innkeeper start, and look over his left shoulder; "I know all about it; but sit down and drink with me, to keep your spirits up, for you must show me the way this very night. Père le Rouge was a dear friend of mine, and before he was burnt for a sorcerer, we had made a solemn compact to meet once every ten years. Now, if you remember aright, it is just ten years this very day, since he was executed; and there is no bond in hell fast enough to hold him from meeting me to-night at the old chateau. So sit you down and drink!—And he poured out a full cup of wine for the innkeeper, who looked aghast at the portentous compact between the stranger and Père le Rouge. However, whether it was that Gaultier was too much afraid to refuse, or had too much esprit de corps not to drink with any one who would drink with him, can hardly be determined now; but so it was, that sitting down, according to the stranger's desire, he poured the whole goblet of wine down his throat at one draught, and, as he afterwards averred, could not help thinking that the stranger must have enchanted the liquor, for so soon as he had swallowed it, than all his fears of Père le Rouge began to die away, like morning dreams.

Yet, when the goblet was drained, Gaultier began more justly to estimate the danger of drinking with a sorcerer; and that the stranger was such, a Champenois aubergiste of 1642 could never be supposed to doubt, after the diabolical compact so unscrupulously confessed. Under this impression, he continued rolling his empty cup about upon the table, revolving at the same time his own critical situation, and endeavouring to determine what might be his duty to his king and country under such perilous circumstances. Rolling the cup to the right—he resolved instantly to denounce this malignant enchanter to the proper authorities, and have him forthwith burnt alive, and sent to join Père le Rouge in the other world, by virtue of the humane and charitable laws in that case especially made and provided. Then rolling the cup to the other side—his eye glanced towards the stranger's bottle; and resting upon the vacuum which their united thirst had therein occasioned, his heart overflowed with the milk of human kindness, and he pitied from his soul that perverted taste which could lead any human being from good liquor, comfortable lodging, and the society of an innkeeper, to a dark wood, a ruined castle, an old roasted sorcerer and the devil, perhaps, into the bargain.

"Would you choose another bottle, sir?" demanded Gaultier; and as his companion nodded his head in token of assent, was about to proceed on this errand—with the laudable intention also of sharing all his newly-arisen doubts and fears with his gentle helpmate, who, for her part, was busily engaged in the soft domestic duties of scolding the stable-boy and boxing the maid's ears. But the stranger stopped him, perhaps divining, and not very much approving, the aforesaid communication. He exclaimed, "La Bourgeoise!" in a tone of voice which overpowered all other noises: the abuse of the dame herself—the tears of the maid—the exculpation of the stable-boy—the cackle of the cocks and hens, which were on a visit in the parlour—and the barking of a prick-eared cur included. The fresh bottle soon stood upon the table; and while the hostess returned to her former tender avocations, the stranger whose clear gray eye seemed reading deeply into Gaultier's heart, continued to drink from the scanty remains of his own bottle, leaving mine host to fill from that which was hitherto uncontaminated by any other touch than his own. This Gaultier did not fail to do, till such time as the last rays of the sun, which had continued to linger fondly amidst a flight of light feathery clouds overhead, had entirely left the sky, and all was gray

At that moment the stranger drew forth his purse, let it fall upon the table with a heavy sort of clinking sound, showing that the louis-d'ors within had hardly room to jostle against each other. It was a sound of comfortable plenty, which had something in it irresistibly attractive to the ears of Gaultier; and, as he stood watching while the stranger insinuated his finger and thumb into the little leathern bag, drawing forth first one broad piece and then another, so splendid did the stranger's traffic with the arch enemy begin to appear in the eyes of the innkeeper, that he almost began to wish that he had been brought up a sorcerer also.

The stranger quietly pushed the two pieces of gold across the table till they got within the innkeeper's sphere of attraction, when they became suddenly hurried towards him, with irresistible velocity, and were plunged into the abyss of a large pocket on his left side, close upon his heart.

The stranger looked on with philosophic composure, as if considering some natural phenomenon, till such time as the operation was complete. "Now, Gaultier," cried he, "put on your beaver, and lead to the beginning of the Grove. I will find my way through it alone. But, hark ye, say no word to your wife."

Gaultier was all complaisance, and having placed his hat on his head, he opened the door of the auberge, and brought forth the stranger's horse, fancying that what with a bottle of wine, and two pieces of gold, he could meet Beelzebub himself, or any other of those gentlemen of the lower house, with whom the curé used to frighten the little boys and girls when they went to their first communion. However, the stranger had scarcely passed the horse's bridle over his arm, and led him a step or two on the way, when the cool air and reflection made the innkeeper begin to think differently of the devil, and be more inclined to keep at a respectful distance from so grave and antique a gentleman. A few steps more made him as frightened as ever; and before they had got to the end of the village, Gaultier fell hard to work, crossing himself most laboriously, and trembling every time he remembered that he was conducting one sorcerer to meet another, long dead and delivered over in form, with fire and fagot, into the hands of Satan.

It is probable that he would have run, but the stranger was close behind, and cut off his retreat.

At about a mile-and-a-half from the little village of Mesnil, stood the old Chateau of St. Loup, situated upon an abrupt eminence, commanding a view of almost all the country round. The valley at its foot, and the slope of the hill up to its very walls, were covered with thick wood, through which passed the narrow deserted road from Mesnil, winding in and out with a thousand turns and divariations, and twice completely encircling the hill itself, before it reached the castle-gate, which once, in the hospitable pride of former days, had rested constantly open for the reception equally of the friend and the stranger, but which now only gave entrance to the winds and tempests—rude guests, that contributed, even more than Time himself, the great destroyer, to bring ruin and desolation on the deserted mansion. Hard by, in a little cemetery, attached to the chapel, lay many of the gay hearts that had once beat there, now quiet in the still cold earth. There, mouldering like the walls that overshadowed them, were the last sons of the brave and noble race of Mesnil, without one scion left to dwell in the halls of their forefathers, or to grieve over the desolation of their heritage. There, too, lay the vassals, bowed to the will of a sterner Lord, and held in the surer bondage of the tomb; and yet, perhaps, in life, they had passed on, happier than their chief, without his proud anxiety and splendid cares; and now, in death, his bed was surely made as low, and the equal wind that whispered over the grave of the one, offered no greater flattery to the monument of the other.

But, beyond all these, and removed without the precincts of consecrated ground, was a heap of shards and flints—the sorcerer's grave! Above it, some pious hand had raised the symbol of salvation—a deed of charity, truly, in those days, when eternal mercy was farmed by the Church, like a turnpike on the high-road, and none could pass but such as paid toll. But, however, there it rose—a tall white cross, standing, as that symbol should always stand, high above every surrounding object, and full in view of all who sought it.

As the aubergiste and his companion climbed the hill, which, leading from the village of Mesnil, commanded a full prospect of the rich woody valley below, and overhung that spot which, since the tragedy of poor Père le Rouge, had acquired the name of the Sorcerer's Grove, it was this tall white cross that first caught their attention. It stood upon the opposite eminence, distinctly marked on the back-ground of the evening sky, catching every ray of light that remained, while behind it, pile upon pile, lay the thick clouds of a coming storm.

"There, Monsieur," cried Gaultier, "there is the cross upon the sorcerer's grave!" And the fear which agitated him while he spoke, made the stranger's lip curl into a smile of bitter contempt. But as they turned the side of the hill, which had hitherto concealed the castle itself from their sight, the teeth of Gaultier actually chattered in his head, when he beheld a bright light shining from several windows of the deserted building.

"There!" exclaimed the stranger, "there, you see how well Père le Rouge keeps his appointment. I am waited for, and want you no further. I can now find my way alone. I would not expose you, my friend, to the dangers of that Grove."

The innkeeper's heart melted at the stranger's words, and he was filled with compassionate zeal upon the occasion. "Pray don't go," cried Gaultier, almost blubbering betwixt fear and tender-heartedness; "pray don't go! Have pity upon your precious soul! You'll go to the devil, indeed you will!—or, at least, to purgatory for a hundred thousand years, and be burnt up like an overdone rabbit. You are committing murder, and conspiracy, and treason,"—the stranger started, but Gaultier went on—"and heresy, and pleurisy, and sorcery, and you will go to the devil, indeed you will—and then you'll remember what I told you."

"What is fated, is fated!" replied the stranger, in a solemn voice, though Gaultier's speech had produced that sort of tremulous tone, excited by an inclination either to laugh or to cry. "I have promised, and I must go. But let me warn you," he continued sternly, "never to mention one word of what has passed to-night, if you would live till I come again. For if you reveal one word even to your wife, the ninth night after you have done so, Père le Rouge will stand on one side of your bed, and I on the other, and Satan at your feet, and we will carry you away body and soul, so that you shall never be heard of again." When he had concluded, the stranger waited for no reply, but sprang upon his horse, and galloped down into the wood.

In the mean time, the landlord climbed to a point of the hill, from whence he could see both his own village, and the ruins of the castle. There, the sight of the church-steeple gave him courage, and he paused to examine the extraordinary light which proceeded from the ruin. In a few minutes, he saw several figures flit across the windows, and cast a momentary obscurity over the red glare which was streaming forth from them upon the darkness of the night. "There they are!" cried he, "Père le Rouge, and his pot-companion! and surely the devil must be with them, for I see more than two, and one of them has certainly a tail—Lord have mercy upon us!"

As he spoke, a vivid flash of lightning burst from the clouds, followed instantly by a tremendous peal of thunder. The terrified innkeeper started at the sound, and more than ever convinced that man's enemy was on earth, took to his heels, nor ceased running till he reached his own door, and met his better angel of a wife, who boxed his ears for his absence, and vowed he had been gallanting.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE jingle of Claude de Blènaus spurs, as he descended with a quick step the staircase of the Palais Cardinal, told, as plainly as a pair of French spurs could tell, that his heart was lightened of a heavy load since he had last tried their ascent; and the spring of his foot, as he leaped upon his horse, spoke much of renewed hope, and banished apprehension.

But the devil of it is—(for I must use that homely but happy expression)—the devil of it is, that the rebound of hope raises us as much above the level of truth, as the depression of fear sinks us below it: and De Blènaus, striking his spurs into the sides of his horse, cantered off towards St. Germain's as gaily as if all doubt and danger were over, and began to look upon bastilles, tortures, and racks, with all the other et-cetera of Richelieu's government, as little better than chimeras of the imagination, with which he had nothing further to do.

Hope sets off at a hand gallop, Consideration soon contents herself with a more moderate pace, and Doubt is reduced, at best, to a slow trot. Thus, as De Blènaus began to reflect, he unconsciously drew in the bridle of his horse; and before he had proceeded one league on the way to St. Germain's, the marks of deep thought were evident both in the pace of the courser and the countenance of the rider—De Blènaus knitting his brow, and biting his lip, as the various dangers that surrounded him crossed his mind; and the gentle barb, seemingly animated by the same spirit as his master, bending his arched-neck and throwing out his feet with as much consideration as if the firm Chemin de St. Germain had been no better than a quagmire.

De Blènaus well knew that, even in France, a man might smile, and smile, and be a villain; and that the fair words of Richelieu too often preceded his most remorseless actions. He remembered also the warning of Mademoiselle de Bourbon, and felt too strongly how insecure a warranty was conscious innocence for his safety ; but still he possessed that sort of chivalrous pride which made him look upon flight as degrading under any circumstances, and more especially so, when the danger was the most apparent. Like the lion, he might have slowly avoided the hunters while unattacked ; but once pressed by the chase, he turned to resist or to suffer. Such was the quality of his mind ; and in the present instance, he resolved to await his fate with firmness, whatsoever that fate might be.

I know not whether an author, like an Old Bailey witness, be, by the laws in that case made and provided, obliged to tell, on every occasion, not only the truth, but the whole truth : however, lest I should offend against any known or unknown statute, be it remarked, that the whole credit due to the determination of De Blénau is not to be attributed to that great and magnanimous quality, called by some persons, undaunted resolution, and by others, fool-hardiness ; for in this, as in almost every other proceeding of the human heart, there were two or three little personal motives which mingled with all his ideas, and, without his knowing any thing about it, brought his reasoning to the conclusion aforesaid.

Of these little motives, I shall only pick out one as a specimen ; but this one in the breast of a young man of five-and-twenty, living in a romantic age, and blest with a romantic disposition, may be considered all-sufficient. It was love ; and who is there that will presume to say, Claude de Blénau was not completely justified in resolving to hazard all, rather than part with Pauline de Beaumont ?

As long as any hesitation had remained in the mind of De Blénau, he had proceeded, as we have seen, with a slow unequal pace ; but the moment his determination was fixed, his thoughts turned towards St. Germain's, and all his ideas concentrating into one of those day-dreams, that every young heart is fond to indulge, he spurred on his horse, eager to realize some, at least, of the bright promises which hope so liberally held forth. It was late, however, before he arrived at the end of his journey, and internally cursing the etiquette which required him to change his dress before he could present himself at the palace, he sent forward his page to announce his return, and beg an audience of the queen.

His toilet was not long, and without waiting for the boy's return, he set out on foot, hoping to join the royal circle before it separated for the evening. In this he was disappointed. Anne of Austria was alone; and though her eyes sparkled with gladness for his unexpected return, and her reception was as kind as his good services required, De Blénau would have been better pleased to have been welcomed by other lips.

"I could scarce credit the news till I saw you, mon chambellan," said the queen, extending her hand for him to kiss; "nor can I truly believe it is you whom I behold even now. How have you escaped that dreadful man?"

"I will tell your majesty all that has happened," replied the count; "and as I have a boon to ask, I think I must represent my sufferings in your majesty's cause in the most tremendous colours. But without a jest, I have had little to undergo beyond a forced attendance at the cardinal's fête, where the only hard word I received, was from L'Angeli, the Duke of Enghien's fool, who, seeing my riding-dress, asked if I were puss in boots." De Blénau then shortly related all that had occurred during his stay in Paris. "And thus, madam," he added, "you see that Chavigni has kept his word; for had it not been for that promise, I doubt not I should have been even now comfortably lodged in the Bastille, with a table at his majesty's expense.

The queen mused for a moment without making any reply; but from her countenance it seemed that she was not a little troubled by what she had heard.

"De Blénau," said she at length, in a calm but melancholy voice, "there is something concealed here. The cardinal has deeper plans in view. As Marie de Bourbon told you, they are plotting my ruin. When first I entered France, that man of blood and treachery resolved to make me his slave. He flattered my tastes, he prevented my wishes; like an insidious serpent he wound himself into my confidence; and I was weak enough to dream that my husband's minister was my best friend. With as much vanity as insolence, he mistook condescension for love. He sought his opportunity, and dared to insult my ears with his wishes. I need not tell you, De Blénau, what was my reply; but it was such as stung him to the soul. He rose from where he had been kneeling at my feet, and threatened such vengeance, that, as he said, my whole life should be one long succession of miseries. Too truly has he kept his word." The queen paused, and as was often her custom when any circumstance called her memory back to the bitter events of her past life, fell into a deep revery, from which it was not easy to rouse her.

"Too much of this," said she at length; "we must look to the present, De Blénau. As the mother of two princes, Richelieu both hates and fears me; and I see that they are plotting my ruin. But yours shall not be involved therein. De Blénau, you must fly till the storm has passed by."

"Pardon me, madam," replied the count, "but in this I cannot yield your majesty that obedience I would willingly show under any other circumstances. I cannot, I must not fly. My own honour, madam, requires that I should stay; for if flight be not construed into an evidence of guilt, it may at least be supposed a sign of cowardice."

"Indeed, indeed! De Blénau," said the queen earnestly, "you must do as I require; nay," she added with a mixture of sweetness and dignity, "as I command. If they can prove against you, that you have forwarded letters from me to my brother the King of Spain, they will bring you to the block, and will most likely ruin me."

"I trust to the promise your majesty gave me when first I undertook to have those letters conveyed to your royal brother King Philip," answered De Blénau: "you then pledged to me your word that they were alone of a domestic nature, and that they should always continue so, without ever touching upon one subject of external or internal policy, so that my allegiance to my king, and my duty to my country, should alike remain pure and inviolable. I doubt not that your majesty has pointedly kept this promise; and De Blè nau will never fly, while he can lay his hand upon his heart and feel himself innocent."

"Yes, but remember, my good youth," replied the queen, "that this cardinal,—my husband's tyrant rather than his subject,—has commanded me, his queen, to forbear all correspondence with my brother, and has narrowly watched me to prevent that very communication between Philip and myself, which your kindness hath found means to procure. Remember, too, his remorseless nature; and then judge whether he will spare the man who has rendered his precautions vain."

"Madam," replied De Blè nau, "I do not fear. Nothing shall make me fly. Though there be no bounds to what the cardinal dare attempt, yet his power does not extend to make me a coward!"

"But for my sake," still persevered Anne of Austria, labouring to persuade him to a measure on which she too well knew his safety depended. "Remember, that if there be proved against me, even so small a crime as having sent those letters, my ruin is inevitable, and there are modes of torture which will wrench a secret from the most determined constancy."

"I fear me," replied De Blè nau, "that some act of mine must have much degraded me in your majesty's opinion."

"No, no, my friend!" said the queen, "not so indeed,—I do not doubt you in the least, but I would fain persuade you, De Blè nau, to that which I know is best and safest."

"Your majesty has now given me the strongest reasons for my stay," replied De Blè nau, with a smile; "I have now the means of proving my fidelity to you, and nothing shall tempt me to leave you at this moment. But in the mean time there is one favour I have to request."

"Name it," replied the queen: "indeed, De Blè nau, you might command it."

"Your majesty is too good," said the count. "I will make my story as brief as possible, but I must explain to you, that Mademoiselle de Beaumont and myself were plighted to each other when very young."

"I know it—I know it all," interrupted the queen, "and that you love each other still; and believe me, my dear De Blénau, neither time nor disappointment has so frozen my heart, that I cannot enter warmly into all you feel. Perhaps you never discovered that Anne of Austria was an enthusiast.—But tell me, what difficulty has occurred between you?"

"Why, in truth, madam," answered De Blénau, "the difficulty arises with your majesty."

"With me!" cried the queen. "With me, De Blénau! impossible! Nothing could give me more pleasure than to see your union. This Pauline of yours is one of the sweetest girls that ever I beheld; and with all her native unbought graces, she looks amongst the rest of the court like a wild rose in a flower-garden,—not so cultivated, in truth, but more simply elegant, and sweeter than them all."

Those who say that all is selfishness, let them tell me how it is that one simple word in praise of those we love, will give a thousand times more pleasure, than the warmest commendation of ourselves.

De Blénau's heart beat, and his eye sparkled, and he paused a moment ere he could reply; nor indeed were his first sentences very distinct. He said a great deal about her majesty's goodness, and his own happiness, and Pauline's excellence; all in that sort of confused way, which would make it appear simple nonsense were it written down; but which very clearly conveyed to the queen how much he loved Pauline, and how much obliged he was to her majesty for praising her.

After this, he entered rather more regularly into a detail of those circumstances which had induced Mademoiselle de Beaumont to suspect him. "The point which seems to affect her most," continued De Blénau, "is the visit with which Mademoiselle de Hauteford honoured me by your majesty's command, in order to receive from me the last letter from your majesty to the King of Spain, which I was unhappily prevented from forwarding by my late wounds. Now this as affecting the character of the lady your majesty employed in the business, does certainly require some explanation. In regard to every thing else, Pauline will, I feel sure, consider my word sufficient."

"Oh, leave it all to me, leave it all to me!" exclaimed the queen, laughing. "What! jealous already is she fair maid? But fear not, De Blénau. Did she know you as well as I do, she would doubt herself sooner than De Blénau. However, I undertake to rob the rose of its thorn for you, and leave the love without the jealousy. A woman is very easily convinced where she loves, and it will be hard if I cannot show her that she has been in the wrong. But take no unworthy advantage of it, De Blénau," she continued; "for a woman's heart will not hesitate at trifles, when she wishes to make reparation to the man she loves."

"All the advantage I could ever wish to take," replied the count, "would be, to claim her hand without delay."

"Nay, nay, that is but a fair advantage," said the queen. "Yet," continued she, after a moment's pause, "it were not wise to draw the eyes of suspicion upon us at this moment. But there are such things as private marriages, De Blénau."

There was no small spice of romance in the character of Anne of Austria; and this, on more than one occasion, led her into various circumstances of danger, affecting both herself and the state. Of an easy and generous spirit, she always became the partisan of the oppressed, and any thing that interested or excited her feelings, was certain to meet encouragement and support, however chimerical or hazardous; while plans of more judgment and propriety were either totally discountenanced, or improperly pursued. This appeared through her whole life, but more especially at an after period, when the government fell into her own hands, and when, like a child with some fine and complicated machine, she played with the engine of the state, till she deranged all its functions."

It was, perhaps, this spirit of romance, more than any political consideration, which, in the present instance, made her suggest to the Count de Blénau, the idea of a private marriage with Pauline de Beaumont; and he, as ardent as herself, and probably as romantic, caught eagerly at a proposal which seemed to promise a more speedy union with the object of his love, than was compatible with all the tedious ceremonies and wearisome etiquette attendant upon a court-marriage of that day.

"I shall not see your Pauline to-night," said the queen, continuing the conversation which this proposal had induced. "She excused herself attending my evening circle, on account of a slight indisposition; but to-morrow I will explain every thing on your part, and propose to her myself what we have agreed upon."

"She is not ill, I trust?" said De Blénau.

"Oh no!" replied the queen, smiling at the anxiety of his look, "not enough even to alarm a lover, I believe."

This answer, however, was not sufficient for De Blénau, and taking leave of the queen, he sent for one of Madame de Beaumont's servants, through whose intervention he contrived to obtain an audience with no less a person than Louise, Pauline's suivante. Now Louise was really a pretty woman, and doubtless her face might have claimed remembrance from many a man who had nothing else to think of. De Blénau remembered it too, but without any reference to its beauty, which, indeed, he had never stayed to inquire into.

It must be remembered, that the morning previous to his journey to Paris, the moment before he was joined by Chavigni, his eye had been attracted by that nobleman, engaged in earnest conversation with a girl, habited in the dress of dear Languedoc; and he now found in the soubrette of Mademoiselle de Beaumont, the very individual he had seen in such circumstances. All this did not very much enhance the regard of De Blénau towards Louise; and he satisfied himself with a simple inquiry concerning her mistress's health, adding a slight recommendation to herself, to take care whom she gossiped with while she remained at St. Germain, conveyed in that stately manner, which made Louise resolve to hate him most cordially for the rest of her life, and declare that he was not half so nice a gentleman as Monsieur de Chavigni, who was a counsellor into the bargain.

After a variety of confused dreams, concerning queens and cardinals, bastilles and private marriages, De Blénau woke to enjoy one of those bright mornings which often shine out in the first of autumn—memorials of summer, when summer itself is gone. It was too early to present himself at the palace; but he had now a theme on which his thoughts were not unwilling to dwell, and therefore as soon as he was dressed, he sauntered out, most lover-like, into the park, occupied with the hope of future happiness, and scarcely sensible of any external thing, save the soothing influence of the morning air, and the cheerful hum of awakening nature.

As time wore on, however—and, probably it did so faster than he fancied—his attention was called towards the palace by an unusual degree of bustle and activity amongst the attendants, who were now seen passing to and fro along the terrace, with all the busy haste of a nest of emmets disturbed in their unceasing industry.

His curiosity being excited, he quitted the principal alley in which he had been walking, and ascending the flight of steps leading to the terrace, entered the palace by the small door of the left wing. As none of the servants immediately presented themselves, he proceeded by one of the side staircases to the principal saloon, where he expected to meet some of the valets de chambre, who generally at that hour awaited the rising of the queen.

On opening the door, however, he was surprised to find Anne of Austria already risen, together with the Dauphin and the young Duke of Anjou, the principal ladies of the court, and several menial attendants, all habited in travelling costumes; while various trunk-mails, saddle-bags, portmanteaus, &c., lay about the room; some already stuffed to the gorge with their appropriate contents, and others opening their wide jaws to receive whatever their owners chose to cram them withal.

As soon as De Blénau entered this scene of unprincely confusion, the quick eyes of Anne of Austria lighted upon him, and, advancing from a group of ladies to whom she had been speaking, she seemed surprised to see him in the simple morning costume of the court.

"Why, De Blénau!" exclaimed she, "we wait for you, and you have neither boots nor cloak. Have you not seen the page I sent to you?"

"No, indeed, madam," replied De Blénau; "but having loitered in the park some time, I have probably thus missed receiving your commands."

"Then you have not heard," said the queen, "we have been honoured this morning by a summons to join the king at Chantilly."

"Indeed!" rejoined De Blénau, thoughtfully, "What should this mean, I wonder? It is strange! Richelieu was to be there last night: so I heard it rumoured yesterday in Paris."

"I fear me," answered the queen, in a low tone, "that the storm is about to burst upon our head. A servant informs me, that riding this morning, shortly after sunrise, near that small open space which separates this, the forest of Laye, from the great wood of Mantes, he saw a large party of the cardinal's guard winding along towards the wooden bridge, at which we usually cross the river."

"Oh I think nothing of that," replied the count. "Your majesty must remember, that this cardinal has his men scattered all over the country:—but, at all events, we can take the stone bridge farther down. At what time does your majesty depart? I will but pay my compliments to these ladies, and then go to command the attendance of my train, which will at all events afford some sort of escort."

During this dialogue, the queen had looked from time to time towards the group of ladies who remained in conversation at the other end of the apartment; and with that unsteadiness of thought peculiar to her character, she soon forgot all her fears and anxieties, as she saw the dark eye of Pauline de Beaumont wander every now and then with a furtive glance, towards De Blénau, and then suddenly fall to the ground, or fix upon vacancy, as if afraid of being caught in such employment.

Easily reading every line expressive of a passion to which she had once been so susceptible, the queen turned with a playful smile to De Blénau. "Come," said she, "I will save you the trouble of paying your compliments to more than one of those ladies, and she shall stand your proxy to all the rest. Pauline—Mademoiselle de Beaumont," she continued, raising her voice, "come hither, flower! I would speak a word with you."

Pauline came forward—not unhappy in truth, but with the blood rushing up into her cheeks and forehead, till timidity became actual pain, while the clear cold blue eye of Mademoiselle de Hauteford followed her across the room, as if she wondered at the feelings she herself had apparently never experienced.

De Blénau advanced and held out his hand. Pauline instantly placed hers in it, and in the confusion of the moment laid the other upon it also.

"Well," said the queen with a smile. "De Blénau you must be satisfied now. Nay, be not ashamed, Pauline; it is all right, and pure, and natural."

"I am not ashamed, madam," replied Pauline, seeming to gain courage from the touch of her lover; "I have done De Blénau wrong in ever doubting one so good and so noble as he is; but he will forgive me now, I know, and I will never do him wrong again."

I need not proceed further with all this, De Blénau and Pauline enjoyed one or two moments of unmingled happiness, and then the queen reminded them that he had yet to dress for his journey, and to prepare his servants to accompany the carriages. This, however, was soon done, and in less than half an hour, De Blénau rejoined the party in the saloon of the palace.

"Now, De Blénau," said the queen, as soon as she saw him, "you are prepared for travelling at all points. For once be ruled, and instead of accompanying me to Chaunilly, make the best of your way to Franche Comté, or to Flanders, for I much fear that the cardinal has not yet done with you. I will take care of your interests while you are gone, even better than I would my own ; and I promise you that as soon as you are in safety, Madame de Beaumont and Pauline shall follow you, and you may be happy surely, though abroad, for a few short years, till Richelieu's power or his life be passed away."

De Blénau smiled. "Nay, nay," replied he, "that would not be like a gallant knight and true, either to desert my queen or my lady love. Besides, I am inclined to believe that this journey to Chantilly, bodes us good rather than harm. For near three months past, the king has been there almost alone with Cinq Mars, who is as noble a heart as e'er the world produced, and is well affected towards your majesty. So I am looking forward to brighter days."

"Well, we shall see," said the queen, with a doubtful shake of the head. "You are young, De Blénau, and full of hopes,—all that has passed away with me.—Now let us go. I have ordered the carriages to wait at the end of the terrace, and we will walk thither:—perhaps it may be the last time I shall ever see my favourite walk : for who knows if any of us will ever return?"

With these melancholy anticipations, the queen took the arm of Madame de Beaumont, and, followed by the rest, led the way to the terrace, from which was to be seen the vast and beautiful view extending from St. Germain over Paris to the country beyond, taking in all the windings of the river Seine, with the rich woods through which it flowed.

The light mists of an autumnal morning still hung about the various dells and slopes, softening, but not obscuring the landscape ; and every now and then the sunbeams would catch upon a tower or a spire in the distant landscape, and create a glittering spot amidst the dark brown woods round about.

It is ever a bright scene, that view from St. Germain, and many have been the royal, and the fair, and the noble whose feet have trod the terrace of Henry the Fourth ; but seldom, full seldom, has there been there, a group of greater loveliness or honour than that which then followed Anne of Austria from the palace. The melancholy which hung over the whole party took from them any wish for further conversation, than a casual comment upon the beauties of the view; and thus they walked on nearly in silence, till they had approached within a few hundred yards of the extremity, where they were awaited by the carriages prepared for the queen and her ladies, together with the attendants of De Blénau.

At that moment the quick clanging step of armed men was heard following, and all with one impulse turned to see who it was that thus seemed to pursue them.

The party which had excited their attention, consisted of a soldier-like old man, who seemed to have ridden hard and half-a-dozen chasseurs of the guard, who followed him at about ten or twelve paces distance.

"It is the Count de Thiery," said De Blénau; "I know him well: as good an old soldier as ever lived."

Notwithstanding De Blénau's commendation, Anne of Austria appeared little satisfied with the count's approach and continued walking on towards the carriages with a degree of anxiety in her eye, which speedily communicated feelings of the same kind to her attendants. Pauline, unacquainted with the intrigues and anxieties of the court, saw from the countenances of all around that something was to be apprehended; and magnifying the danger from uncertainty in regard to its nature, she instinctively crept close to De Blénau, as certain of finding protection there.

Judging at once the cause of De Thiery's coming, De Blénau drew the arm of Pauline through his, and lingered a step behind, while the rest of the party proceeded.

"Dear Pauline!" said he, in a low but firm tone of voice, "my own Pauline! prepare yourself for what is coming! I think you will find that this concerns me. If so, farewell! and remember, whatever be my fate, that De Blénau has loved you ever faithfully, and will love you till his last hour.—Beyond that—God only knows! but if ever human affection passed beyond the tomb, my love for you will endure in another state."

By this time they had reached the steps, at the bottom of which the carriages were in waiting, and at the same moment the long strides of the Count de Thiery had brought him to the same spot

"Well, Monsieur de Thiery!" said Anne of Austria, turning sharp round, and speaking in that shrill tone which her voice assumed whenever she was agitated either by fear or anger; "your haste implies bad news. Does your business lie with me?"

"No, so please your majesty," replied the old soldier; "no farther than to wish you a fair journey to Chantilly, and to have the pleasure of seeing your majesty to your carriage."

The queen paused, and regarded the old man for a moment with a steady eye, while he looked down upon the ground and played with the point of his grey beard, in no very graceful embarrassment.

"Very well!" replied she at length; "you, Monsieur de Thiery, shall hand me to my carriage. So, De Blénau, I shall not need your attendance. Mount your horse and ride off."

"Pardon me, your majesty," said De Thiery, stepping forward with an air of melancholy gravity, but from which all embarrassment was now banished. "Monsieur de Blénau," he continued, "I have a most unpleasant task to accomplish: I am sorry to say you must give up your sword; but be assured that you render it to a man of honour, who will keep it as a precious and invaluable charge, till he can give it back to that hand, which he is convinced will always use it nobly."

"I foresaw it plainly!" cried the queen, and turned away her head. Pauline clasped her hands and burst into tears: but amongst the attendants of De Blénau, who during this conversation had one by one mounted the steps of the terrace, there was first a whisper, then a loud murmur, then a shout of indignation, and in a moment a dozen swords were gleaming in the sunshine.

Old De Thiery laid his hand upon his weapon, but De Blénau stopped him in his purpose.

"Silence!" cried he in a voice of thunder; "Traitors, put up your swords!—My good friends," added he, in a gentler tone, as he saw himself obeyed, "those swords, which have before so well defended their master, must never be drawn in a cause that De Blénau could blush to own. "Monsieur le Comte de Thiery," he continued, unbuckling his weapon, "I thank you for the handsome manner in which you have performed a disagreeable duty. I do not ask to see the lettre de cachet, which, of course, you bear; for, in giving you the sword of an honourable man, I know I could not place it in better hands; and now, having done so, allow me to lead her majesty to her carriage, and I will then follow you whithersoever you may have commands to bear me."

"Most certainly," replied De Thiery, receiving his sword; "I wait your own time, and will remain here till you are at leisure."

De Blénau led the queen to the carriage in silence, and having handed her in, he kissed the hand she extended to him, begging her to rely upon his honour and firmness. He next gave his hand to Pauline de Beaumont, down whose cheeks the tears were streaming unrestrained. "Farewell, dear Pauline! farewell!" he said. Her sobs prevented her answer, but her hand clasped upon his with a fond and lingering pressure, which spoke more to his heart than the most eloquent adieu.

Madame de Beaumont came next, and embraced him warmly. "God protect you, my son!" said she, "for your heart is a noble one."

Mademoiselle de Hauteford followed, greeting De Blénau with a calm cold smile and a graceful bow; and the rest of the royal suite having placed themselves in other carriages, the cavalcade moved on. De Blénau stood till they were gone. Raising his hat, he bowed with an air of unshaken dignity as the queen passed, and then turning to the terrace, he took the arm of Count de Thiery, and returned a prisoner to the palace.

CHAPTER XIV.

"WELL, sir," said De Blénau, smiling with feelings mingled of melancholy resignation to his fate and proud disdain for his enemies, "imprisonment is too common a lot, nowadays, to be matter of surprise, even where it falls on the most innocent. Our poor country, France, seems to have become one great labyrinth, with the bastille in the centre, and all the roads terminating there. I suppose that such is my destination."

"I am sorry to say it is," replied his companion. "My orders are to carry you thither direct; but I hope that your sojourn will not be long within its walls. Without doubt, you will soon be able to clear yourself."

"I must first know of what I am accused," replied the count. "If they cry in my case, as in that of poor Clement Marot Prenez le, il a mangé le lard, I shall certainly plead guilty; but I know of no state crime which I have committed, except eating meat on a friday.—It is as well, perhaps, Monsieur de Thiery," continued he, falling into a graver tone, "to take these things lightly. I cannot imagine that the cardinal means me harm; for he must well know that I have done nothing to deserve ill, either from my king or my country. Pray God his eminence's breast be as clear as mine!"

"Umph!" cried the old soldier, with a meaning shake of the head, "I should doubt that, De Blénau. You have neither had time nor occasion to get it so choked up as his must be. But these are bad subjects to talk upon: though I swear to Heaven, sir count, that when I was sent upon this errand, I would have given a thousand livres to have found that you had been wise enough to set out last night for some other place."

"Innocence makes one incautious," replied De Blénau; "but I will own I was surprised to find that the business had been put upon you."

"So was I," rejoined the other. "I was astonished, indeed, when I received the lettre de cachet. But a soldier has nothing to do but obey, Monsieur de Blénau. It is true, I one time thought to make an excuse; but, on reflection, I found that it would do you no good, and that some one might be sent to whom you would less willingly give your sword than to old De Thiery. But here we are at the palace, sir. There is a carriage in waiting; will you take any refreshment before you go?"

The prospect of imprisonment for an uncertain period, together with a few little evils, such as torture and death, in the perspective, had not greatly increased De Blénau's appetite, and he declined accepting the Count de Thiery's offer, but requested that his page might be allowed to accompany him to Paris. The orders of Richelieu, however, were strict in this respect, and De Thiery was obliged to refuse. "But," added he, "if the boy has wit he may smuggle himself into the bastille afterwards. Let him wait for a day or two, and then crave of the gaoler to see you. The prison is not kept so close as those on the outside of it imagine. I have been in more than once myself, to see friends who have been confined there. There was poor La Forte, who was afterwards beheaded, and the Chevalier de Caply, who is in there still. I have seen them both in the bastille."

"You will never see the Chevalier de Caply again," replied De Blénau, shuddering at the remembrance of his fate. "He died yesterday morning under the torture."

"Grand Dieu!" exclaimed De Thiery; "this cardinal prime minister stands on no ceremonies. Here are five of my friends he has made away with in six months. There was La Forte, whom I mentioned just now, and Boissy, and De Reinville, and St. Charon; and now you tell me Caply too; and if you should chance to be beheaded, or die under the torture, you will be the sixth."

"You are kind in your anticipations, sir," replied De Blénau, smiling at the old man's bluntness, yet not particularly enjoying the topic. "But having done nothing to merit such treatment, I hope I shall not be added to your list."

"I hope not, I hope not!" exclaimed De Thiery. "God forbid! I think, in all probability, you will escape with five or six weeks imprisonment; and what is that?"

"Why, no great matter, if considered philosophically," answered De Blénau, thoughtfully. "And yet, Monsieur de Thiery, liberty is a great thing. The very freedom of walking amidst all the beauties of the vast creation, of wandering at our will from one perfection to another, is not to be lost without a sigh. But it is not that alone—the sense, the feeling of liberty, is too innately dear to the soul of man to be parted with as a toy.”

While De Blénau thus spoke, half reasoning with himself, half addressing his conversation to the old soldier by his side, who, by long service had been nearly drilled into a machine, and could not, consequently, enter fully into the feelings of his more youthful companion, the carriage which was to convey them to Paris was brought round to the gate of the palace at which they stood. Figure to yourself, my dearly beloved reader, a vehicle in which our good friend, the giant Magog, of Guildhall, could have stood upright; its long sides bending inwards with a graceful sweep, like the waist of Sir Charles Grandison in his best and stiffest coat: and then conceive all this mounted upon an interminable perch, connecting the heavy pairs of wheels, which, straggling and far apart, looked like two unfortunate hounds coupled together against their will, and eternally struggling to get away from each other. Such was the chaise roulante which stood at the gate of the palace, ready to convey the prisoner to Paris.

The preparations that had been made for De Blénau's journey to Chantilly, now served for this last agreeable expedition; and the various articles which he conceived would be necessary to his comfort, were accordingly disposed about the vehicle, whose roomy interior was not likely to suffer from repletion.

It is sad to say farewell to any thing, and more especially where uncertainty is mingled with the adieu. Had it been possible, De Blénau would fain have quitted St. Germain's without encountering the fresh pain of taking leave of his attendants; but those who had seen his arrest, had by this time communicated the news to those who had remained in the town, and they now all pressed round to kiss his hand, and take a last look of their kind-hearted lord, before he was lost to them, as they feared, for ever. There was something affecting in the scene, and a glistening moisture rose even in the eye of the old Count de Thiery, while De Blènaux, with a kind won't to say to each, bade them farewell, one after another, and then sprang into the carriage that was to convey him to a prison.

The vehicle rolled on for some way in silence, but at length De Blènaux said, "Monsieur de Thiery, you must excuse me if I am somewhat grave. Even conscious rectitude cannot make such a journey as this very palatable. And besides," he added, "I have to-day parted with some that are very dear to me."

"I saw that, I saw that," answered the old soldier.

"It was bad enough parting with so many kind hearts as stood around you just now, but that was a worse farewell at the end of the terrace. Now out upon the policy that can make such bright eyes shed such bitter tears. I can hardly get those eyes out of my head, old as it is. Oh, if I were but forty years younger!"

"What then?" demanded de Blènaux, with a smile.

"Why, perhaps I might have ten times more pleasure in lodging you safe in the Bastille than I have now," answered De Thiery. "Oh, Monsieur de Blènaux, take my word for it, age is the most terrible misfortune that can happen to any man; other evils will mend, this is every day getting worse."

The conversation between de Blènaux and his companion soon dropped, as all conversation must do, unless it be forced, where there exists a great dissimilarity of ideas and circumstances. It is true, from time to time, Monsieur de Thiery uttered an observation which called for a reply from De Blènaux; but the thoughts which crowded upon the young count were too many, and too overpowering in their nature, to find relief in utterance. The full dangers of his situation, and all the vague and horrible probabilities which the future offered, presented themselves more forcibly to his mind, now that he had leisure to dwell upon them, than they had done at first, when all his energies had been called into action; and when, in order to conceal their effect from others, he had been obliged to fly from their consideration himself.

A thousand little accessory circumstances also kept continually renewing the recollection of his painful situation. When he dropped his hand, as was his custom, to rest it upon the hilt of his sword, his weapon was gone, and he had to remember that he had been disarmed; and if by chance he cast his eyes from the window of the carriage, the passing and repassing of the guards continually reminded him that he was a prisoner. De Blénau was new to misfortune, and consequently the more sensible to its acuteness, Nor did he possess that buoyant spirit with which some men are happily gifted by nature—that sort of carelessness which acts better than philosophy, raising us above the sorrows and un comforts of existence, and teaching us to bear our misfortunes by forgetting them as soon as possible. He had too much courage, it is true, to resign himself to grief for what he could not avoid.—He was prepared to encounter the worst that fate could bring; but at the same time he could not turn his thoughts from the contemplation of the future, though it offered nothing but dark indistinct shapes; and out of these his imagination formed many horrible images, which derived a greater appearance of reality from the known cruelty of Richelieu, in whose power he was, and the many dreadful deeds perpetrated in the place to which he was going.

Thus passed the hours away as the carriage rolled on towards Paris. It may be well supposed that such a vehicle as I have described, did not move with any great celerity; and I have much doubt whether the act-of-parliament pace, which hackney-coaches are obliged to adhere to, would not have jolted the unhappy chaise roulante limb from limb, if it had been rigorously enforced. But it so happened, that the machine itself, was the personal property of Monsieur de Thiery, who always styled it une belle voiture; and looking upon it as the most perfect specimen of the coach-building art, he was mighty cautious concerning its progression. This the postilion was well aware of, and therefore never ventured upon a greater degree of speed, than might carry them over the space of two miles in the course of an hour; but notwithstanding such prudent moderation, the head of Monsieur de Thiery would often be protruded from the window, whenever an unfriendly rut gave the vehicle a jolt, exclaiming loudly "Holla! Postillon! gardez vous de casser ma belle voiture;" and sundry other adjurations, which did not serve to increase the rapidity of their progress.

Such tedious waste of time, together with the curious gazing of the multitude at the state-prisoner, and uncertain calculations as to the future, created for De Blénau a state of torment to which the bastille at once would have been relief; so that he soon began most devoutly to wish his companion and the carriage and the postilion all in the fire together, for going so slowly, But, however tardily time's wing seem to move, they bear him away from us notwithstanding. Night overtook the travellers when they were about a league from Paris, and the heaviest day De Blénau had ever yet known, found its end at last.

Avoiding the city as much as possible, the carriage passed round and entered by the Porte St. Antoine; and the first objects which presented themselves to the eyes of De Blénau, after passing the gates, were the large gloomy towers of the bastille, standing alone and naked in the moonlight, which showed nothing but their dark and irregular forms, strongly contrasted with the light and rippling water that flowed like melted silver in the fosse below.

One of the guards had ridden on before they entered the city, to announce their approach; and as soon as the carriage came up, the outer draw-bridge fell with a heavy clang, and the gates of the court opening, admitted them through the dark gloomy porch into that famous prison, so often the scene of horror and of crime. At the same time, two men advancing to the door, held each a lighted torch to the window of the carriage, which, flashing with a red gleam upon the rough stone walls, and gloomy archways on either side, showed plainly to De Blénau all the frowning features of the place, rendered doubly horrible by the knowledge of its purpose.

A moment afterwards, a fair soft-looking man, dressed in a black velvet pourpoint (whom De Blénau discovered to be the governor) approached the carriage with an official paper in his hand, and lighted by one of the attendant's torches, read as follows, with that sort of hurried drawl which showed it to be a matter of form :—

"Monsieur le Comte de Thiery," said he, "you are commanded by the king to deliver into my hands, the body of Claude Count de Blénau, to hold and keep in strict imprisonment, until such time as his majesty's will be known in his regard, or till he be acquitted of the crime with which he is charged, by a competent tribunal ; and I now require you to do the same."

This being gone through, De Thiery descended from the carriage, followed by the Count de Blénau, whom the governor instantly addressed with a profound bow and servile smile.

"Monsieur de Blénau," said he, "you are welcome to the Bastille; and any thing I can do for your accommodation, consistent with my duty, you shall command."

"I hope you will let it be so, sir governor," said old De Thiery ; "for Monsieur de Blénau is my particular friend, and without doubt he will be liberated in a few days. Now, Monsieur de Blénau," continued he, "I must leave you for the present, but hope soon to see you in another place. You will, no doubt, find several of your acquaintances here ; for we all take it in turn ; and indeed, now-a-days, it would be almost accounted a piece of ignorance not to have been in the Bastille once in one's life. So, farewell !" And he embraced him warmly, whispering as he did so, "Make a friend of the governor—gold will do it !"

De Blénau looked after the good old soldier with feelings of regret, as he got into his belle voiture and drove through the archway. Immediately after, the draw-bridge rose, and the gates closed with a clang, sounding on De Blénau's ears as if they shut out from him all the hopes and friendships of the world ; and overpowered by a feeling of melancholy desolation, he remained with his eyes fixed in the direction De Thiery had taken, till he was roused by the governor laying his hand upon his arm. "Monsieur de Blénau," said he, "will you do me the favour of following me, and I shall have the honour of showing you your apartment."

"De Blénau obeyed in silence, and the governor led the way into the inner court, and thence up the chief staircase to the second story, where he stopped at a heavy door plated with iron, and sunk deep in the stone wall, from the appearance of which, De Blénau did not argue very favourably of the chambers within. His anticipations, however, were agreeably disappointed, when one of the attendants, who lighted them, pulled aside the bolts, and throwing open the door, exposed to his view a large neat room, fitted up with every attention to comfort, and even some attempt at elegance. This, the governor informed him, was destined for his use while he did the Bastille the honour of making it his abode; and he then went on in the same polite strain, to apologize for the furniture being in some disorder, as the servants had been very busy in the chateau, and had not had time to arrange it since its last occupant had left them, which was only the morning before. So far, De Blénau might have imagined himself in the house of a polite friend, had not the bolts and bars obtruded themselves on his view wherever he turned, speaking strongly of a prison.

The end of the governor's speech, also, was more in accordance with his office: "My orders, Monsieur de Blénau," said he in continuation, "are, to pay every attention to your comfort and convenience, but at the same time, to have the strictest guard over you. I am therefore obliged to deny you the liberty of the court, which some of the prisoners enjoy, and I must also place a sentinel at your door. I will now go and give orders for the packages which were in the carriage to be brought up here, and will then return immediately to advise with you on what can be done to make your time pass more pleasantly."

Thus saying, he quitted the apartment, and De Blénau heard the heavy bolts of the door grate into their sockets with a strange feeling of reluctance; for though he felt too surely that liberty was gone, yet he would fain have shrunk from those outward marks of captivity which continually forced the recollection of it upon his mind. The polite attentions of the governor, however, had not escaped his notice, and his thoughts soon returned to that officer's conduct.

"Can this man," thought he, "continually accustomed to scenes of blood and horror, be really gentle in his nature, as he seems to show himself? or can it be that he has especial orders to treat me with kindness? Yet here I am a prisoner,—and for what purpose, unless they intend to employ the most fearful means to draw from me those secrets which they have failed in obtaining otherwise?"

Such was the nature of his first thoughts, for a moment or two after the governor had left him; but rousing himself, after a little, from reveries which threw no light upon his situation, he began to examine more closely the apartment which bade fair to be his dwelling for some time to come.

It was evidently one of the best in the prison, consisting of two spacious chambers, which occupied the whole breadth of the square tower in the centre of the bastille. The first, which opened from the staircase and communicated with the second by means of a small door, was conveniently furnished in its way, containing, besides a very fair complement of chairs and tables of the most solid manufacture, that happy invention of our ancestors, a corner cupboard, garnished with various articles of plate and porcelain, and a shelf of books, which last, De Blè-nau had no small pleasure in perceiving.

On one of the tables were various implements for writing, and on another, the attendant who had lighted them thither, had placed two silver lamps, which, though of an antique fashion, served very well to light the whole extent of the room. Raising one of these, De Blè-nau proceeded to the inner chamber, which was fitted up as a bed-room, and contained various articles of furniture in a more modern taste than that which decorated the other. But the attention of the prisoner was particularly attracted by a heavy iron door near the head of the bed, which, however, as he gladly perceived, possessed bolts on the inside, so as to prevent the approach of any one from without during the night. It would be difficult to say why a man completely in the power of his enemies, should be pleased to find that they could not take him by surprise ; and yet the prisoner, who sadly missed his sword, which he could not, and would not have used had he possessed it, thought of lying down to rest with more composure when he knew that his adversaries could not break upon him unawares in the night, though every hour of the four-and-twenty saw his life or death in their hands.

So much of our happiness also is dependent on the trifles of personal comfort, that De Blè nau who little care in general for very delicate entertainment, nevertheless, felt himself more at ease, when, on looking round his apartment, he found that at all events it was no dungeon to which he had been consigned : and from this he drew a favourable augury, flattering himself that no very severe measures would ultimately be pursued towards him, when such care was taken of his temporary accommodation.

De Blè nau had just time to complete the perambulation of his new abode, when the governor returned, followed by two of the subordinate ministers of the prison, carrying the various articles with which Henry de la Mothe had loaded the belle voiture of Monsieur de Thiery : and as the faithful page had taken care to provide fully for his master's comfort, the number of packages was not small.

As soon as these were properly disposed about the apartment, the governor commanded his satellites to withdraw, and remained alone with his prisoner, who, remembering the last words of the old Count de Thiery, resolved, as far as possible, to gain the good-will of one who had it in his power not only to soften or to aggravate the pains of his captivity, but even perhaps to serve him more essentially. De Thiery had recommended gold, all-powerful gold, as the means to be employed ; but at first De Blè nau felt some hesitation as to the propriety of offering sordid coin to a man holding so responsible a situation, and no small embarrassment as to the manner. It was true that Richelieu, for the purpose of having a willing and unscrupulous tool in the dark stronghold of his evil power, had advanced a man of inferior station to a post usually held by officers of rank and honour ; but still De Blè nau could not help believing that he must have fingers unsullied with a bribe whom the suspicious minister would retain in a place of such trust. These feelings kept him silent for a moment, during which time the governor remained silent also, regarding his prisoner with a polite and affable smile, as if he expected him to begin the conversation.

"I will try the experiment at all events," thought De Blénau. "I could almost persuade myself that the man expects it."

Luckily it so happened, that amongst the baggage which had been prepared for Chantilly, was comprised a considerable sum of money, besides that which he carried about with him: and now drawing forth his purse, the contents of which might amount to about a thousand livres, he placed it in the hands of the governor.

"Let me beg you to accept of this, Monsieur le Gouverneur," said he, "not as any inducement to serve me contrary to your duty, but as a slight remuneration for the trouble which my being here must occasion."

The smooth-spoken governor neither testified any surprise at this proceeding, nor any sort of reluctance to accept what De Blénau proffered. The purse dropped unrejected into his open palm, and it was very evident that his future conduct would greatly depend upon the amount of its contents, according as it was above or below his expectation. So true it is, that the very vices which are necessary to the wicked and ambitious in the tools where-with they work, prove the very means by which they are debased and betrayed.

"Monseigneur," replied he, "you are very good, and seem to understand the trouble which prisoners sometimes give, as well as if you had lived in the Bastille all your life; and you may depend upon it, as I said before, that every thing shall be done for your accommodation—always supposing it within my duty."

"I doubt you not, sir," answered De Blénau who from the moment the governor's fingers had closed upon the purse, could hardly help regarding him as a menial who had taken his wages: "I doubt you not; and at the present moment I should be glad of supper, if such a thing can be procured within your walls."

"Most assuredly it can be procured to-night, sir," replied the governor; "but I am sorry to say, that we have two meager days in the week, at which time neither meat nor wine is allowed by government, even for my own table: which is a very great and serious grievance, considering the arduous duties I am often called upon to perform."

"But of course such things can be procured from without," said De Blè nau, "and on the days you have mentioned. I beg that you would not allow my table to bear witness of any such regulations; and further, as I suppose that you, sir, have the command of all this, I will thank you to order your purveyor to supply all that is usual for a man of my quality and fortune, for which he shall have immediate payment through your hands."

The tone in which De Blè nau spoke, was certainly somewhat authoritative for a prisoner; and feeling, as he proceeded, that he might give offence where it was his best interest to conciliate regard, he added, though not without pain,—

"When you will do me the honour to partake my fare, I shall stand indebted for your society. Shall I say to-morrow at dinner, that I shall have the pleasure of your company?"

The governor readily accepted the invitation, more especially as the ensuing day chanced to be one of those meager days, which he held in most particular abhorrence. And now, having made some further arrangements with De Blè nau, he left him, promising to send the meal which he had demanded.

There is sometimes an art in allowing one's self to be cheated, and De Blè nau had at once perceived that the best way to bind the governor to his interest, was, not only to suffer patiently, but even to promote every thing which could gratify the cupidity of the gaoler or his underlings; and thus he had laid much stress upon the provision of his table, about which he was really indifferent.

Well contented with the liberality of his new prisoner, and praying God most devoutly that the cardinal would spare his life to grace the annals and fatten the officers of the Bastille for many years, the governor took care to send De Blè nau immediately the supper which had been prepared for himself: an act of generosity of which few gaolers, high or low, would have been guilty.

It matters little how De Blè nau relished his meal; suffice it, that the civility and attention he experienced, greatly removed his apprehensions for the future, and made him imagine that no serious proceedings were intended against him. In this frame of mind, as soon as the governor's servants had taken away the remains of his supper, and the bolts were drawn upon him for the night, he took a book from the shelf, thinking that his mind was sufficiently composed to permit of his thus occupying it with some more pleasing employment than the useless contemplation of his own fate. But he was mistaken. He had scarcely read a sentence, before his thoughts, flying from the lettered page before his eyes, had again sought out all the strange uncertain points of his situation, and regarding them under every light, strove to draw from the present some presage for the future. Thus finding the attempt in vain, he threw the book hastily from him, in order to give himself calmly up to the impulse he could not resist. But as the volume fell from his hand upon the table, a small piece of written paper flew out from between the leaves, and after having made a circle or two in the air, fell lightly to the ground.

De Blè nau carelessly took it up supposing it some casual annotation; but the first words that caught his eye rivetted his attention. It began,

"To the next wretched tenant of these apartments I bequeath a secret, which, though useless to me, may be of service to him. To-day I am condemned, and to-morrow I shall be led to the torture or to death. I am innocent; but knowing that innocence is not safety, I have endeavoured to make my escape, and have, by long labour, filed through the lock of the iron door near the bed, which was the sole fastening by which it was secured from without. Unfortunately, this door only leads to a small turret staircase communicating with the inner court; but should my successor in this abode of misery be like me, debarred from exercise, and also all converse with his fellow-prisoners, this information may be useful to him. The file with which I accomplished my endeavour, is behind the shelf which contains these books. Adieu, whoever thou art ! Pray for the soul of the unhappy Caply !”

As he read, the hopes which De Blénau had conceived from the comforts that were allowed him fled in air. There also, in the same apartment, and doubtless attended with the same care, had the wretched Caply lingered away the last hours of an existence about to be terminated by a dreadful and agonizing death. “And such may be my fate,” thought De Blénau with an involuntary shudder, springing from that antipathy which all things living bear to death. But the moment after, the blood rushed to his cheek, reproaching him for yielding to such a feeling, though no one was present to witness its effects. “What !” thought he, “I who have confronted death a thousand times, to tremble at it now ! However, let me see the truth of what this paper tells ;” and entering the bedroom, he approached the iron door, of which he easily drew back the bolts, Caply having taken care to grease them with oil from the lamp, so that they moved without creating the smallest noise.

The moment that these were drawn, the slightest touch opened the door, and De Blénau beheld before him a little winding stone staircase, filling the whole of one of the small turrets ; which containing no chambers, and only serving as a back access to the apartments in the square tower, had been suffered in some degree to go to decay. The walls were pierced with loopholes, which being enlarged by some of the stones having fallen away, afforded sufficient aperture for the moonlight to visit the interior with quite enough power to permit of De Blénau’s descending without other light. Leaving the lamp, therefore, in the bedroom, he proceeded down the steps till they at once opened from the turret into the inner court, where all was moonlight and silence ; it being judged unnecessary, after the prisoners were locked in for the night, to station even a single sentry in a place which was otherwise so well secured.

Without venturing out of the shadow of the tower, De Blénau returned to his apartment, feeling a degree of satisfaction in the idea that he should not now be cut off from all communication with those below in case he should desire it. He no longer felt so absolutely lonely as before, when his situation had appeared almost as much insulated as many of those that the lower dungeons of that very building contained, who were condemned to drag out the rest of their years in nearly unbroken solitude.

Having replaced the paper in the book, for the benefit of any one who might be confined there in future, De Blénau fastened the iron door on the inside, and addressing his prayers to Heaven, he laid himself down to rest. For some time his thoughts resumed their former train, and continued to wander over his situation and its probable termination; but at length his ideas became confused, memory and perception gradually lost their activity, while fatigue and the remaining weakness from his late wounds overcame him, and he slept.

CHAPTER XV.

Now, if the reader imagine that I wrote the whole of the twelfth chapter for the sole purpose of telling a useless story about a country innkeeper and conjurer's first cousin he was very much mistaken. Let him immediately transport himself back to the little village of Mesnil St. Loup, and let him remember the church, and the old trees, and the ruined castle beyond, with all the circumstances thereunto appertaining, and if any thing that has since passed has put the particulars out of his mind, let him return to the aforesaid twelfth chapter, and learn it by heart, as a penance for having forgotten it. But if, on the contrary, he remembers it fully, I will go on with my story.

It was in the old Chateau of St. Loup, near the village of Mesnil, on a sultry evening about the beginning of September, that a party was assembled, who, in point of rank and greatness of design, had seldom been equalled within those walls, even when they were the habitation of the great and beautiful of other days. But years and centuries had passed since they had been so tenanted. The courtyard was full of weeds, and grass, and tangled shrubs: the ivy creeping over the ruined walls obtruded its long branches through the unglazed windows, and the breaches which the siege of time had effected in the solid masonry, gave entrance to the wind of night and the wintry tempest.

The chamber that had been chosen for a place of meeting on the present occasion, was one which, more than any other, had escaped the hand of desolation. The casements it is true, had long ceased to boast of glass, and part of the wall itself had given way, encumbering with its broken fragments the farther end of the great saloon, as it had once been called. The rest, however, of the chamber was in very tolerable repair, and contained also several pieces of furniture, consisting of more than one rude seat, and a large uncouth table, which evidently had never belonged to the castle in its days of splendour.

At the head of this table sat Gaston, Duke of Orleans, the younger brother of the king, leaning his head upon his hand in an attitude of listless indifference, and amusing himself by brushing the dust which had gathered on the board before him, into a thousand fanciful shapes with the feather of a pen—now forming fortifications with lines and parallels, and half-moons and curtains—and then sweeping them all heedlessly away—offering no bad image of the many vast and intricate plans he had engaged in, all of which he had overthrown alike by his caprice and indecision.

Near him sat his two great favourites and advisers, Montessor and St. Ibal: the first of whom, was really the inconsiderate fool he seemed; the second, though not without his share of folly, concealed deeper plans under his assumed carelessness. These two men, whose pride was in daring every thing, affected to consider nothing in the world worth trouble or attention, professing at the same time perfect indifference to danger and uncomfort, and contending that vice and virtue were merely names, which signified any thing, according to their application. Such was the creed of their would-be philosophy; and Montessor lost no opportunity of evincing that heedlessness of every thing serious, which formed the principal point of his doctrine. In the present instance, he had produced a couple of dice from his pocket, and was busily engaged in throwing with St. Ibal for some pieces of gold which lay between them.

Two more completed the party assembled in the old Chateau of St. Loup. The first of these was Cinq Mars: his quick and ardent spirit did not suffer him to join in the frivolous pastimes of the others, but on the contrary, he kept walking up and down the apartment, as if impatient for the arrival of some one expected by all; and every now and then, as he turned the extremity of the chamber, he cast a glance upon the weak duke and his vicious companions, almost amounting to scorn.

Beside the master of the horse, and keeping an equal pace, was the celebrated* De Thou, famed for unswerving integrity and the mild dignity of virtuous courage. His personal appearance, however, corresponded ill with the excellence of his mind; and his plain features, ill-formed figure, and inelegant movements, contrasted strongly with the handsome countenance and princely gait of Cinq Mars, as well as the calm pensive expression of his downcast eye, with the wild and rapid glance of his companion's.

As the time wore away, the impatience of Cinq Mars visibly increased; and every two or three minutes he would stop, and look out from one of the open casements, and then approaching the table, would take one of the torches, of which there were several lighted in the room, and strike it against the wall to increase the flame.

* In the first edition of this work, I had called the person I speak of above, the President de Thou, believing that he had succeeded to the post held both by his father and his grandfather; but I find that such was not the case. He was a Privy Councillor, and Master of Requests, but never arrived at the rank of President.

"It is very extraordinary," cried he at length, "that Fontrailles has not yet arrived."

"Oh! no, Cinq Mars," replied De Thou, "we are a full hour before the time. You were so impatient, my good friend, that you made us all set off long before it was necessary."

"Why, it is quite dark," said the master of the horse, "and Fontrailles promised to be here at nine.—It is surely nine, is it not, Montessor?"

"Size ace," said the gambler, "quatre à quatre, St. Ibal. I shall win it!"

"Pshaw!" cried Cinq Mars—"who will tell me the time? I wish we could have clocks small enough to put in our pockets."

"I saw such a clock but the other day," replied De Thou. "It came from England; but I will show you what will tell us the hour as well as if we had one. Look out there in the west! Do you see what a red light the sun still casts upon those heavy masses of cloud that are coming up? Now the sun goes down at seven; so you may judge it can scarce be eight yet."

"Cinq quatre!" cried Montessor, throwing. "I have lost, after all—Monsieur de Thou, will you bet me a thousand crowns that it is not past eight by the village clock of Mesnil St. Loup?"

"No, indeed!" replied De Thou; "I neither wish to win your money, Monsieur Montessor, nor to lose my own. Nor do I see how such a bet could be determined."

"Oh! if you do not take the bet, there is no use of inquiring how it might be determined," rejoined Montessor. "Monseigneur," he continued, turning to the Duke of Orleans, who had just swept away his last fortification, and was laying out a flower-garden in its place; "can you tell how in the name of fortune these chairs and this table came here, when all the rest of the place is as empty as your highness's purse?"

"Or as your head, Montessor," answered the duke. "But the truth is, they were the property of poor old Père le Rouge, who lived for many years in these ruins, a half knave, half madman,—till they tried and burnt him for a sorcerer down in the wood there at the foot of the hill. Since then, it has been called the Sorcerer's Grove, and the country people are not fond of passing through it, which has doubtless saved the old conjurer's furniture from being burnt for firewood ; for none of the old women in the neighbourhood dare come to fetch it, or infallibly it would undergo the same fate as its master."

"So, that wood is called the Sorcerer's Grove," said St. Ibal, laughing ; "that is the reason your highness brought us round the other way, is it not?"

Gaston of Orleans coloured a good deal at a jest which touched too near one of his prevailing weaknesses ; for no one was more tinctured with the superstition of the day than himself, yet no one was more ashamed of such credulity. "No, no !" answered he ; "I put no faith in Père le Rouge and his prophecies. He made too great a mistake in my own case to show himself to me since his predictions have proved false, I will answer for him."

"Why, what did he predict about you, monseigneur?" asked De Thou, who knew the faith which the duke placed in astrology.

"A great deal of nonsense," answered the duke, affecting a tone very foreign to his real feelings. "He predicted that I should marry the queen after the death of Louis. Now, you see, I have married some one else, and therefore his prophecy was false. But however, as I said, these chairs belonged to him ; where he got them I know not—perhaps from the same place where he derived his knowledge, but at all events I wish he were here to fill one now ; he would be a good companion in our adventures." As he spoke, a bright flash of lightning blazed through the apartment, followed by a loud and rolling peal of thunder, which made the duke start, exclaiming, "Jesu ! what flash !"

"Your highness thought it was Père le Rouge," said St. Ibal ; "but he would most likely come in at the door, if he did come ; not through the window."

Gaston of Orleans heard the jests of his two companions without anger ; and a moment or two after, Cinq

Mars, who stood near one of the dilapidated casements, turned round, exclaiming, "Hark! I hear the sound of a horse's feet; it is Fontrailles at last. Give me a torch, I will show him where we are."

"If it should be the devil now!—" said Montessor, as Cinq Mars left the room.

"Or Père le Rouge," added St. Ibal.

"Or both," said the Duke of Orleans.

"Why for cunning and mischief, they would scarcely supply the place of one Fontrailles," rejoined St. Ibal. "But here comes one or the other,—I suppose it is the same to your royal highness which."

"Oh, yes!" answered the duke, "they shall all be welcome. Nothing like keeping good company, St. Ibal."

As he spoke, Cinq Mars returned, accompanied by Fontrailles, both laughing with no small glee. "What makes ye so merry, my lords?" exclaimed Montessor; "a laugh is too good a thing to be lost. Has Monsieur de Fontrailles encountered his old friend Sathanus by the road-side, or what?"

"Not so," answered Cinq Mars, "he has only bamboozled an innkeeper. But come, Fontrailles, let us not lose time; will you read over the articles of alliance to which we are to put our names; and let us determine upon them to-night, for if we meet frequently in this way, we shall become suspected ere our design be ripe."

"Willingly will I read," replied Fontrailles, approaching the table, and speaking with some degree of emphasis, but without immediately deviating into declamation. "There certainly never was a case when speedy decision was more requisite than the present. Every man in this kingdom, from the king to the peasant, has felt, and does now feel, the evils which we are met to remedy. It is no longer zeal, but necessity, which urges us to oppose the tyranny of this daring minister. It is no longer patriotism, but self-defence. In such a case all means are justifiable; for when a man (as Richelieu has done) breaks through every law, human and divine, to serve the ungenerous purposes of his own aggrandizement; when he sports with the lives of his fellow-creatures with less charity than a wild beast ; are we not bound to consider him as such, and to hunt him to the death for the general safety ?”

De Thou shook his head, as if there was something in the proposition to which he could not subscribe ; but Cinq Mars at once gave his unqualified assent, and al- being seated round the table, Fontrailles drew forth some papers, and proceeded.

“ This, then, is our first grand object,” said he : “ to deprive this tyrant, whose abuse of power not only extends to oppress the subject, but who even dares, with most monstrous presumption, to curb and overrule the royal authority, making the monarch a mere slave to his will, and the monarch’s name but a shield behind which to shelter his own crimes and iniquities—I say, to deprive this usurping favourite of the means of draining the treasures, sacrificing the honour, and spilling the blood of France ; thereby to free our king from bondage, to restore peace and tranquillity to our country, and to bring back to our homes long-banished confidence, security, and ease—to this you all agree ?”

A general assent followed, and Fontrailles went on.

“ Safely to effect our purpose, it is not only necessary to use every energy of our minds, but to exert all the local power we possess. Every member, therefore, of our association, will use all his influence with those who are attached to him by favour or connexion, and prepare all his vassals, troops, and retainers, to act in whatsoever manner shall hereafter be determined, and will also amass whatever sums he can procure for the general object. It will also be necessary to concentrate certain bodies of men on particular points, for the purpose of seizing on some strong fortified places. And further, it will be advisable narrowly to watch the movements of the cardinal, in order to make ourselves masters of his person.”

“ But whose authority shall we have for this ?” demanded De Thou ; “ for while he continues prime minister by the king’s consent, we are committing high treason to restrain his person.”

"We must not be so scrupulous, De Thou," rejoined Cinq Mars; "we must free his majesty from those magic chains in which Richelieu has so long held his mind, before we can expect him to do any thing openly: but I will take it upon me to procure his private assent. I have sounded his inclinations already, and am sure of my ground. But proceed, Fontrailles: let us hear what arrangements you have made respecting troops, for we must have some power to back us, or we shall fail."

"Well, then," said Fontrailles, "I bring with me the most generous offers from the noble Duke of Bouillon. They are addressed to you, Cinq Mars, but were sent open to me. I may as well, therefore, give their contents at once, and you can afterwards peruse them at your leisure. The duke here offers to place his town and principality of Sedan in our hands, as a dépôt for arms and munition, and also as a place of retreat and safety, and a rendezvous for the assembling of forces. He further promises, on the very first call, to march his victorious troops from Italy, when, as he says, every soldier will exult in the effort to liberate his country."

"Generously promised of the duke!" exclaimed Montessor, slapping the table with mock enthusiasm. "My head to a bunch of Macon grapes, he expects to be prime minister in Richelieu's place."

"The Duke of Bouillon, Monsieur de Montessor," replied Cinq Mars, somewhat warmly, "has the good of his country at heart; and is too much a man of honour to harbour the ungenerous thought you would attribute to him."

"My dear Cinq Mars, do not be angry," said Montessor. "Don't you see how much the odds were in my favour? Why, I betted my head to a bunch of grapes, and who do you think would be fool enough to hazard a full bunch of grapes against an empty head? But go on, Fontrailles; where are the next troops to come from?"

"From Spain!" answered Fontrailles calmly; while at the name of that country, at open war with France, and for years considered as its most dangerous enemy, each countenance round the table assumed a look of astonishment and disapprobation, which would probably have daunted any other than the bold conspirator who named it.

"No, no!" exclaimed Gaston of Orleans, as soon as he had recovered breath. "None of the Spanish Catholicon for me;" alluding to the name which had been used to stigmatize the assistance that the League had received from Spain during the civil wars occasioned by the accession of Henry IV. to the throne. "No, no! Monsieur de Fontrailles, this is high treason at once."

St. Ibal was generally supposed, and with much appearance of truth, to have some secret connexion with the Spanish court; and having now recovered from the first surprise into which he had been thrown by the bold mention of an alliance with that obnoxious country, he jested at the fears of the timid and unsteady duke, well knowing that by such means he was easily governed. "Death to my soul!" exclaimed he. "Your highness calls out against high treason, when it is what you have lived upon all your life! Why, it is meat, drink, and clothing to you. A little treason is as necessary to your comfort as a dice-box is to Montessor, a Barbary horse to Cinq Mars, or a bird-net and hawking-glove to the king. But to speak seriously, monseigneur," he continued, "is it not necessary that we should have some further support than that which Monsieur de Bouillon promises! His enthusiasm may have deceived him;—his troops may not be half so well inclined to our cause as he himself;—he might be taken ill; he might either be arrested by the gout, to which he is subject; or by the cardinal, to whom we all wish he was not subject. A thousand causes might prevent his giving us the assistance he intends, and then what an useful auxiliary would Spain prove! Besides, we do not call in Spain to fight against France, but for France. Spain is not an enemy of the country, but only of the cardinal; and the moment that man is removed, who for his sole interest and to render himself necessary has carried on a war which has nearly depopulated the kingdom, a lasting and glorious peace will be established between the two countries; and thus we shall confer another great benefit on the nation."

"Why, in that point of view, I have no objection," replied the Duke of Orleans. "But do you not think that Louis will disapprove of it?"

"We must not let him know it," said Montessor, "till Richelieu is removed, and then he will be as glad of it as any one."

"But still," rejoined the duke, with more pertinacity than he generally displayed, "I am not fond of bringing Spanish troops into France. Who can vouch that we shall ever get rid of them?"

"That will I," answered St. Ibal. "Has your highness forgot what good faith and courtesy the Spanish government has shown you in your exile; as also the assistance it yielded to your late royal mother? Besides, we need not call in a large body of troops. What number do you propose, Fontrailles?"

"The offer of Spain is five thousand," replied Fontrailles; "with the promise of ten thousand more, should we require it. Nothing can be more open and noble than the whole proceeding of King Philip. He leaves it entirely to ourselves what guarantee we will place in his hands for the safety of his troops."

"Well, well," said the Duke of Orleans, getting tired of the subject, "I have no doubt of their good faith. I am satisfied, St. Ibal; and whatever you think right, I will agree to. I leave it all to you and Montessor."

"Well then," said Fontrailles hastily, "that being settled, we will proceed—"

"Your pardon, gentlemen," interposed De Thou, "I must be heard now.—Your schemes extend much farther than I had any idea of. Cinq Mars, I was not informed of all this—had I been so, I would never have come here. To serve my country, to rid her of a minister who, as I conceive, has nearly destroyed her, who has trampled France under his feet, and enthralled her in a blood-stained chain, I would to-morrow lay my head upon the block.—Frown not Monsieur de Fontrailles—Cinq Mars, my noble friend, do not look offended—but I cannot, I will not be a party to the crime into which mistaken zeal is hurrying you. Are we not subjects of France? and is not France at war with Spain? and though we may all wish and pray God that this war may cease, yet to treat or conspire with that hostile kingdom is an act which makes us traitors to our country and rebels to our king. Old De Thou has but two things to lose—his life and his honour. His life is valueless. He would sacrifice it at once for the least benefit to his country. He would sacrifice it, Cinq Mars, for his friendship for you. But his honour must not be sullied: and as through life he has kept it unstained, so shall it go with him unstained to his last hour. Were it merely personal danger you called upon me to undergo, I would not bestow a thought upon the risk; but my fame, my allegiance, my very salvation are concerned, and I will never give my sanction to a plan which begins by the treasonable proposal of bringing foreign enemies into the heart of the land.”

“As to your salvation, Monsieur de Thou,” said Montressor, “I’ll undertake to buy that for you for a hundred crowns. You shall have an indulgence to commit sins ad libitum, in which high treason shall be specified by name. Now, though these red-hot heretics of Germany, who seem inclined to bring that fiery place upon earth, which his holiness threatens them with in another world, and who are assisted by our Catholic cardinal with money, troops, ammunition, and all the hell-invented implements of war,—though these Protestants, I say, put no trust in the indulgences which their apostacy has rendered cheap in the market, yet I am sure you are by far too stanch a stickler for all antique abuses to doubt their efficacy. I suppose, therefore, when salvation can be had for a hundred crowns, good Monsieur de Thou, you can have no scruple on that score—unless indeed you are as stingy as the dog in the fable.”

“Jests are no arguments, Monsieur de Montressor,” replied De Thou, with stern gravity; “you have a bad habit, young sir, of scoffing at what wiser men revere. Had you any religion yourself of any kind, or any reason for having none, we might pardon your error, because it was founded on principle. As for myself, sir, what I believe, I believe from conviction, and what I do, I do with the firm persuasion that it is right; without endeavouring to cloak a bad cause with a show of spirit, or to hide my incapacity to defend it with stale jokes and profane raillery. Gentlemen, you act as you please; for my part I enter into no plan by which Spain is to be employed or treated with."

"I think it dangerous too," said the unsteady Duke of Orleans.

"Ten times more dangerous to attempt any thing without it," exclaimed Fontrailles. "Should we not be fools to engage in such an enterprise without some foreign power to support us? We might as well go to the Palais Cardinal and offer our throats to Richelieu at once."

Montessor and St. Ibal both applied themselves to quiet the fears of the duke, and soon succeeded in removing from his mind any apprehensions on the score of Spain: but he continued from time to time to look suspiciously at De Thou, who had risen from the table, and was again walking up and down the apartment. At length Gaston beckoned to Cinq Mars, and whispered something in his ear.

"You do him wrong, my lord," exclaimed Cinq Mars indignantly; "I will answer for his faith. De Thou," he continued, "the duke asks your promise not to reveal what you have heard this night; and though I think my friend ought not to be suspected, I will be obliged by your giving it."

"Most assuredly," replied De Thou; "his highness need be under no alarm. On my honour, in life or in death, I will never betray what I have heard here. But that I may hear as little as possible, I will take one of these torches, and wait for you in the lower apartments."

"Take care that you do not meet with Père le Rouge, Monsieur de Thou," exclaimed St. Ibal, as De Thou left them.

"Cease your jesting, gentlemen," said Cinq Mars, "we have had too much of it already. A man with the good conscience of my friend De Thou, need not mind whom he meets. For my own part, I am resolved to go on with the business I have undertaken; I believe I am in the right; and if not, God forgive me, for my intentions are good."

The rest of the plan was soon settled after De Thou had left the room; and the treaty which it was proposed to enter into with Spain was read through and approved. The last question which occurred, was the means of conveying a copy of this treaty to the court of King Philip, without taking the circuitous route by the Low Countries. Numerous difficulties presented themselves to every plan that was suggested, till Fontrailles, with an affectation of great modesty, proposed to be the bearer himself, if, as he said, they considered his abilities equal to the task.

The offer was of course gladly accepted, as he well knew it would be; and now being to the extent of his wish furnished with unlimited powers, and possessed of a document which put the lives of all his associates in his power, Fontrailles brought the conference to an end; it being agreed that the parties should not meet again till after his return from Spain.

A few minutes more were spent in seeking cloaks and hats, and extinguishing the torches, and then descending to the courtyard, they mounted their horses, which had found shelter in the ruined stable of the old castle, and set out on their various roads. By this time the storm had cleared away leaving the air but the purer and the more serene; and the bright moon shining near her meridian, served to light Cinq Mars and De Thou on their way towards Paris, while the Duke of Orleans and his party bent their steps towards Bourbon, and Fontrailles set off for Troyes to prepare for his journey to Spain.

CHAPTER XVI.

I WISH to Heaven it were possible, in a true story, to follow the old Greek's rule, and preserve at least unity of place throughout. It would save a great deal of trouble both to writer and reader, if we could make all our characters come into one hall, say their say, and have done with it. But there is only one place where they could truly be supposed to meet—heroes and heroines, statesmen and conspirators, servant and master, proud and humble—the true Procrustes' bed which is made to fit every one. However, as before I could get them there, the story would be done, and the generation passed away, I must even violate all the unities together, and gallop after my characters all over the country, as I have often seen a shepherd in the Landes of France, striding here and there upon his long stilts after his wilful and straggling sheep, and endeavouring in vain to keep them all together. I must ask the reader, therefore, to get into the chaise with me, and set off for Chantilly; and as we go, I will tell him a few anecdotes, just to pass the time.

It was a common custom with Louis the Thirteenth to spend a part of every morning in that large circular piece of ground at Chantilly, called then, as now, the Manège; while his various hunters, in which he took great delight, were exercised before him. Here, while the few gentlemen that generally accompanied him, stood a step behind, he would lean against one of the pillars that surrounded the place, and remark, with the most minute exactitude, every horse as it passed him, expressing his approbation to the grooms when any thing gave him satisfaction. But on the same morning which had witnessed at St. Germain the arrest of De Blenau, something had gone wrong with the king at Chantilly. He was impatient, cross, and implacable: and Lord Montague, an English nobleman, who was at that time much about him, remarked in a low voice to one of the gentlemen in waiting, "His majesty is as peevish as a crossed child, when Cinq Mars is absent."

The name of his Graud Ecuyer, though spoken very low, caught the king's ear.

"Do any of you know when Cinq Mars returns?" demanded he. "We never proceed well when he is not here.—Look at that man now, how he rides," continued Louis, pointing to one of the grooms; "would not any one take him for a monkey on horseback? Do you know where Cinq Mars is gone, Mi Lor?"

"I hear, sire," replied Lord Montague, "that he is gone with Monsieur de Thou to Troyes, where he has an estate, about which there is some dispute, which Monsieur de Thou, who is learned in such matters, is to determine."

"To Troyes!" exclaimed the king; "that is a journey of three days. Did not some of you tell me that Chavigni arrived last night, while I was hunting?"

"I did so, please your majesty," replied one of the gentlemen; "and I hear, moreover, that the cardinal himself slept at Luzarches last night, with the purpose of being here early this morning."

"The cardinal at Luzarches!" said the king, a cloud coming over his brow. "It is strange I had not notice—We shall scarce have room for them all—I expect the queen to-night—and the cardinal and her majesty are as fond of each other as a hawk and a heron poulet."

Louis was evidently puzzled. Now the best way to cut the Gordian knot of an embarras, is to run away from it and let it settle itself. It is sure to get unravelled somehow; and by the time you come back, a thousand to one the fracas is over. Louis the Thirteenth, who of all men on earth hated what is called in the vulgar tongue a piece of work, except when he made it himself, was very much in the habit of adopting the expedient above mentioned, and, indeed, had been somewhat a loser by the experiment. However, it was a habit now, confirmed by age, and therefore more powerful than nature. Accordingly, after thinking for a moment about the queen and the cardinal, and their mutual hatred, and their being pent up together in the small space of Chantilly, like two game-cocks in a cock-pit; and seeing no end to it whatever, he suddenly burst forth—

"Come, messieurs, I'll go hunt. Quick! saddle the horses!" and casting kingly care from his mind, he began humming the old air, Que ne suis je un Berger! while he walked across the manège towards the stables. But just at that moment, Chavigni, presented himself, doffing his hat with all respect to the king, who could not avoid seeing him.

Louis was brought to bay, but still he stood his ground. 'Ah! good day, Monsieur de Chavigni,' exclaimed he, moving on towards the stables. 'Come in good time to hunt with us. We know you are free of the forest.'

'I humbly thank your majesty,' replied the statesman; 'but I am attending the cardinal.'

'And why not attend the king, sir? Ha!' exclaimed Louis, his brow gathering into a heavy frown. 'It is our will that you attend us, sir.'

Chavigni did not often commit such blunders, but it was not very easy to remember at all times to pay those external marks of respect which generally attend real power, to a person who had weakly resigned his authority into the hands of another: and as the cardinal not only possessed kingly sway, but maintained kingly state, it sometimes happened that the king himself was treated with scanty ceremony. This, however, always irritated Louis not a little. He cared not for the splendour of a throne, he cared not even for the luxuries of royalty; but of the personal reverence due to his station, he would not bate an iota, and clung to the shadow when he had let the substance pass away. The statesman now hastened to repair his error and bowing profoundly, he replied, 'Had I not thought that in serving the cardinal I best served your majesty, I should not have ventured on so bold an answer; but as your majesty is good enough to consider my pleasure in the chase, and the still greater pleasure of accompanying you, your invitation will be more than an excuse for breaking my appointment with the cardinal.'

To bear the burden of forcing one of the council to break his engagement with the prime minister, and all for so trifling a cause as an accidental hunting-party, was not in the least what the king wished or intended, and he would now very willingly have excused Chavigni's attendance; but Chavigni would not be excused.

The wily statesman well knew, that Richelieu had that day a point to carry with the king of the deepest importance as to the stability of his power. The queen, whom the cardinal had long kept in complete depression,* being now the mother of two princes, her influence was increasing in the country to a degree that alarmed the minister for his own sway. It was a principle with Richelieu always to meet an evil in its birth; and seeing plainly that as the king's health declined—and it was then failing fast—the party of Anne of Austria would increase if he did not take strong measures to annihilate it—he resolved at once to ruin her with her husband, to deprive her of her children, and, if possible, even to send her back to Spain. “And then,” thought he, “after the king's death I shall be regent.—Regent? King! ay, and one more despotic than ever sat upon the throne of France. For twenty years this young dauphin must be under my guidance; and it will be strange indeed if I cannot keep him there till my sand be run.” And the proud man, who reasoned thus, knew not that even then he trembled on the verge of the grave.

* The state to which the persevering enmity of Richelieu had reduced the queen by the time of the above journey to Chantilly is thus

“Ainsi, dissipateurs peu sages
Des rapides bientais du temps,
Nos desirs embrasent des âges,
Et nous n'avons que des instans.”

However, the object of his present visit to Chantilly was to complete the ruin of the queen; and Chavigni, who suffered his eyes to be blinded to simple right and wrong by the maxims of state policy, lent himself entirely to the cardinal's measures, little imagining that personal hatred had any share in the motives of the great minister whose steps he followed.

A moment's reflection convinced Chavigni that he might greatly promote the object in view by accompanying the king in the present instance. He knew that in difficult enterprises the most trifling circumstances may be turned to advantage; and he considered it a great thing gained at that moment, to lay Louis under the necessity painted by La Porte, an eyewitness. “Le Roi ne la voyoit point, ni M. Cardinal, ni même aucune personne de la cour, hormis ses domestiques dont la plus grande partie la trahissoit. M. de Guittaut la vit, et n'en fit pas mieux sa cour. On remarqua que quantité de courtisanes passant dans la cours du Château de Chantilly buissoient la vue, pour qu'on ne crut pas qu'ils regardoient les fenêtres de sa chambre, &c. &c.”

of offering some amends, even for the apparent trifle of making him break his appointment with Richelieu. In riding with the king, he would have an opportunity of noting the monarch's state of mind, which he perceived was unusually irritated, and also of preparing the way for those impressions which Richelieu intended to give : and accordingly he avoided with consummate art any subject which might open the way for Louis to withdraw his previous order to accompany him.

Having already followed one royal hunt somewhat too minutely, we will not attempt to trace the present ; only observing that during the course of the day, Chavigni had many opportunities of conversing with the king, and took care to inform him that the campaign in the Netherlands was showing itself much against the arms of France ; that no plan was formed by the government, which did not by some means reach the ears of the Spanish generals, and consequently that all the manœuvres of the French troops were unavailing ; and from this, as a natural deduction, he inferred, that some one at the court of France must convey information to the enemy ; mingling these pleasant matters of discourse, with sundry sage observations respecting the iniquity and baseness of thus betraying France to her enemies.

Louis was exactly in the humour that the statesman could have wished. Peevish from the absence of Cinq Mars, and annoyed by the unexpected coming of Richelieu, he listened with indignation to all that Chavigni told him, of any one in France conveying intelligence to a country which he hated with the blindest antipathy.

The predominant passion in the king's mind had long been his dislike to Spain, but more especially to Philip, whom he regarded as a personal enemy : and Chavigni easily discerned, by the way in which the news he conveyed was received, that if they could cast any probable suspicion on the queen (and Chavigni really believed her guilty), Louis would set no bounds to his anger. But just at the moment he was congratulating himself upon the probable success of their schemes, a part of the storm he had been so busily raising fell unexpectedly upon himself.

‘Well, Monsieur de Chavigni,’ said the king, after the chase was over, and the royal party were riding slowly back towards Chantilly, ‘this hunting is a right noble sport: think you not so, sir?’

‘In truth I do, sire,’ replied Chavigni, ‘and even your majesty can scarce love it better than myself.’

‘I am glad to hear it, sir,’ rejoined the king, knitting his brows: ‘’tis a good sign. But one thing I must tell you, which is, that I do not choose my royal forests to be made the haunt of worse beasts than stags and boars.—No wolves and tigers.—Do you take me, sir?’

‘No, indeed, sire,’ replied Chavigni, who really did not comprehend the king’s meaning, and was almost tempted to believe that he had suddenly gone mad. ‘Allow me to remind your majesty that wolves are almost extinct in this part of France, and that tigers are altogether beasts of another country.’

‘There are beasts of prey in every part of the world,’ answered the king. ‘What I mean, sir, is, that robbers and assassins are beginning to frequent our woods; especially, sir, the wood of Mantes. Was it that, or was it the forest of Laye, in which the young Count de Blénau was attacked the other day?’

It was not easy on ordinary occasions to take Chavigni by surprise, and he was always prepared to repel open accusations, or to parry indirect interrogatories, with that unhesitating boldness, or skilful evasion, the proper application of which is but one of the lesser arts of diplomacy; but, on the present occasion, the king’s question was not only so unexpected as nearly to overcome his habitual command of countenance, but was also uttered in such a tone as to leave him in doubt whether Louis’s suspicions were directed personally towards himself. He replied, however, without hesitation: ‘I believe it was the wood of Mantes, sire; but I am not perfectly sure.’

‘You, of all men, ought to be well informed on that point, Monsieur de Chavigni,’ rejoined the king, ‘since you took care to send a servant to see it rightly done.’

The matter was now beyond a doubt, and Chavigni replied boldly, ‘Your majesty is pleased to speak in riddles, which I am really at a loss to comprehend.’

"Well, well, sir," said Louis hastily, "it shall be inquired into, and made plain both to you and me. Any thing that is done legally must not be too strictly noticed; but I will not see the laws broken, and murder attempted, even to serve state purposes."

Thus speaking, the king put his horse into a quicker pace, and Chavigni followed with his mind not a little discomposed, though his countenance offered not the slightest trace of embarrassment. How he was to act, now became the question; and running over in his own mind all the circumstances connected with the attack upon the Count de Blénau, he could see no other means by which Louis could have become acquainted with his participation therein, than by the loquacity of Philip, the woodman of Mantes: and as he came to this conclusion, Chavigni internally cursed that confident security which had made him reject the advice of Lafemas, when the sharp-witted judge had counselled him to arrest Philip on first discovering that he had remarked the livery of Isabel and silver amongst the robbers.

In the present instance the irritable and unusually decided humour of the king, made him fear that inquiries might be instituted immediately, which would not only be dangerous to himself personally, but might probably overthrow all those plans which he had been labouring, in conjunction with the cardinal, to bring to perfection. Calculating rapidly, therefore, all the consequences which might ensue, Chavigni resolved at once to have the woodman placed in such a situation as to prevent him from giving any further evidence of what he had seen. But far from showing any untimely haste, though he was the first to dismount in the courtyard in order to offer the king his aid in alighting; yet that ceremony performed, he loitered, patting his horse's neck, and giving trifling directions to his groom, till such time as Louis had entered the palace, and his figure had been seen passing the window at the top of the grand staircase. That moment, however, Chavigni darted into the Chateau, and seeking his own apartments, he wrote an order for the arrest of Philip the woodman, which with the same despatch he placed in the hands of two of his most devoted creatures, adding a billet to the governor of the Bastille, in which he begged him to treat the prisoner with all kindness, and allow him all sort of liberty within the prison, but on no account to let him escape till he received notice from him.

We have already had occasion to see that Chavigni was a man who considered state-policy paramount to every other principle; and naturally not of an ungentle disposition or ignoble spirit, he had unfortunately been educated in a belief that nothing which was expedient for the statesman could be discreditable to the man. However, the original bent of his mind generally showed itself in some degree, even in his most unjustifiable actions, as the groundwork of a picture will still shine through, and give a colour to whatever is painted above it. In the present instance, as his only object was to keep the woodman out of the way till such time as the king's unwonted mood had passed by, he gave the strictest commands to those who bore the order for Philip's arrest, to use him with all possible gentleness, and to assure his wife and family that no harm was intended to him. He also sent him a purse, to provide for his comfort in the prison, which he well knew could not be procured without the potent aid of gold.

The two attendants, accustomed to execute commands which required despatch, set out instantly on their journey, proceeding with all speed to Beaumont, and thence to Pontoise, where crossing the river Oise they soon after arrived at Meulan: and here a dispute arose concerning the necessity of calling upon two exempts of that city to aid in arresting Philip the woodman; the one servant arguing that they had no such orders from their lord, and the other replying that the said Philip might have twenty companions for aught they knew, who might resist their authority, they not being legally entitled to arrest his majesty's lieges. This argument was too conclusive to be refuted; and they therefore waited at Meulan till the two exempts were ready to accompany them.

It being night when they arrived at Meulan, and the two exempts being engaged in "potations deep and strong," drinking long life to the Cardinal de Richelieu and success to the royal prisons of France, some time was of course spent before the party could proceed. However, after a lapse of about an hour, discussed no matter how, they all contrived to get into their saddles, and passing the bridge over the Seine, soon reached the first little village, whose white houses, conspicuous in the moonlight, seemed, on the dark background of the forest, as if they had crept for protection into the very bosom of the wood; while it, sweeping round them on every side, appeared in its turn to afford them the friendly shelter that they sought.

All was silence as they passed through the village, announcing plainly that its sober inhabitants were comfortably dozing away the darkness. This precluded them from asking their way to Philip's dwelling; but Chavigni had been so precise in his direction, that notwithstanding the wine-pots of Meulan, the two servants, in about half an hour after having entered the wood, recognised the abreuvoir and cottage, with the long-felled oak and piece of broken ground, and all the other et-cetera, which entered into the description they had received.

There is nothing half so amusing as the bustle with which little people carry on the trifles that are intrusted to them. They are so important, and so active, one would think that the world's turning round upon its axis depended upon them; while all the mighty business of the universe slips by as quietly as if the wheels were oiled; and the government of a nation is often decided over a cup of coffee, or the fate of empires changed by an extra bottle of Johannisberg.

But to return. Chavigni's two servants, with the two exempts of Meulan, were as important and as busy as emmets when their hill is disturbed—or a sous-secrétaire when he opens his first despatch, and receives information of a revolution in the Isle of Man—or the fleas in an Italian bed, when you suddenly light your candle to see what the devil is biting you so infernally—or the devil himself in a gale of wind—or any other little persons in a great flurry about nothing. So having discovered the cottage, they held a profound council before the door, disputing vehemently as to the mode of proceeding. One of the exempts proposed to knock at the door, and then suddenly to seize their prisoner as he came to open it; but Chavigni's servants, though somewhat dipped in the Lethean flood, in which the exempts of Meulan had seduced them to bathe, remembered the strict orders of their master, to treat Philip with all possible gentleness, and judging that the mode proposed might startle him, and affect his nerves, they decided against the motion.

A variety of other propositions were submitted, and rejected by the majority, each one liking nobody's suggestion but his own; till one of the exempts, not bearing clearly in mind the subject of discussion, knocked violently at the door, declaring it was tiresome to stand disputing on their feet, and that they could settle how they should gain admission after they had got in and sat down.

This seemed a very good motion, and settled the matter at once: and Philip, who was in that sound and fearless sleep which innocence, content, and labour can alone bestow, not exactly answering at first, they all repeated the noise, not a little enraged at his want of attention, to personages of such high merit as themselves.

The moment after, the woodman appeared at the window, and seeing some travellers, as he imagined, he bade them wait till he had lighted a lamp, and he would come to them. Accordingly, in a moment or two Philip opened the door, purposing either to give them shelter, or to direct them on their way, as they might require; but when the light gleamed upon the black dresses of the exempts, and then upon the well-known colours of Isabel and silver, the woodman's heart sank, and his cheek turned pale, and he had scarcely power to demand their errand.

"I will tell you all that presently," replied the principal servant of the two; who, like many another small man, in many another place, thought to become great by much speaking. "First let us come in and rest ourselves; for as you may judge by our dusty doublets, we have ridden far and hard: and after that I will expound to you, good friend, the cause of our coming, with sundry other curious particulars, which may both entertain and affect you."

Philip suffered them to enter the house one after another, and setting down the lamp, he gazed upon them in silence, his horror at gentlemen in black coats and long straight swords, as well as those dressed in Isabel and silver being quite unspeakable.

"Well, Monsieur Philip le Bucheron," said the spokesman, throwing himself into the oaken settle with that sort of percussion of breath denoting fatigue: "you seem frightened, Monsieur Philip; but, good Monsieur Philip, you have no cause for fear. We are all your friends, Monsieur Philip."

"I am glad to hear it, sir," replied the woodcutter; "but may I know what you want with me?"

"Why, this is the truth, Monsieur Philip," replied the servant; "it seems that his majesty the king, whom we have just left at Chantilly, is very angry about something.—Lord knows what! and our noble employer, not to say master, the Count de Chavigni, having once upon a time received some courtesy at your hands, is concerned for your safety, and has therefore deemed it necessary that you should be kept out of the way for a time."

"Oh, if that be the case," cried Philip, rubbing his hands with gladness, "though I know not why the king's anger should fall on me, I will take myself out of the way directly."

"No, no, Monsieur Philip, that won't do exactly," answered the servant. "You do not know how fond my master is of you; and so concerned is he for your safety, that he must be always sure of it, and therefore has given us command to let you stay in the Bastille for a few days."

At that one word Bastille, Philip's imagination set to work, and instantly conjured up the image of a huge tower of red copper, somewhat mouldy, standing at the top of a high mountain, and guarded by seven enormous giants with but one eye apiece, and the like number of fiery dragons with more teeth and claws than would have served a dozen. If it was not exactly this, it was something very like it ; for Philip, whose travels had never extended a league beyond the wood of Mantes, knew as much about the Bastille as Saint Angustin did of Heaven,—so both drew from their own fancy for want of better materials.

Nevertheless, the purse which Chavigni's attendants gave him in behalf of their master, for they dared not withhold his bounty, although they might be much inclined, greatly allayed the fears of the woodman.

There is something wonderfully consolatory in the chink of gold at all times ; but in the present instance, Philip drew from it the comfortable conclusion, that they could not mean him any great harm when they sent him money.

" I know not what to think," cried he.

" Why, think it is exactly as I tell you," replied the servant, " and that the count means you well. But after you have thought as much as you like, get ready to come with us, for we have no time to spare."

This was the worst part of the whole business. Philip had now to take leave of his good dame Joan, which, like a well-arranged sermon, consisted of three distinct parts ; he had first to wake her, then to make her comprehend, and then to endure her lamentation.

The first two were tasks of some difficulty, for Joan slept tolerably well—that is to say, you might have fired a cannon at her ear without making her hear—and when she was awake, her understanding did not become particularly pellucid for at least an hour after. This on ordinary occasions—but on the present Philip laboured hard to make her mind take in, that he was arrested and going to the Bastille. But finding that her senses were still somewhat obdurate, and that she did nothing but rub her eyes, and stretch and yawn in his face, he had recourse to the same means morally, which he would have used physically to cleave an oak ; namely, he kept shouting to her, " Bastille ! Bastille ! Bastille !" reiterating the word upon her ear, just in the same manner that he would have plied the timber with his axe.

At length she comprehended it all. Her eye glanced from the inner room upon the unwonted guests who occupied the other chamber, and then to the dismayed countenance of her husband; and divining it suddenly, she threw her arms round the athletic form of the woodman, bursting into a passion of tears, and declaring that he should not leave her.

Of course on all such occasions there must follow a very tender scene between husband and wife, and such there was in the present instance: only Joan, availing herself of one especial privilege of the fair sex, did not fail, between her bursts of tears and sobs, to rail loudly at the cardinal, the king, and all belonging to them, talking more high treason in five minutes, than would have cost any man an hour to compose; nor did she spare even the exempts, or the two gentlemen in Isabel and silver, but poured forth her indignation upon all alike.

However, as all things must come to an end, so did this; and Philip was carried away amidst the vain entreaties which his wife at length condescended to use.

The only difficulty that remained was, how to mount their prisoner, having all forgot to bring a horse from Meulan for that purpose; and Philip not choosing to facilitate his own removal by telling them that he had a mule in the stable.

However, it was at length agreed, that one of the exempts should walk to the next town, and that Philip should ride his beast till another could be obtained. As the party turned away from the hut, the chief servant, somewhat moved by the unceasing tears of Joan, took upon him to say that he was sure that Charles the woodman's son, who stood with his mother at the door, would be permitted to see his father at the Bastille, if they would all agree to say, that they did not know what was become of him, in case of any impertinent person inquiring for him during his absence.

This they all consented to, their grief being somewhat moderated by the prospect of communicating with each other, although separated; and Philip once more having bid his wife and children adieu, was carried on to a little village, where a horse being procured for him, the whole party took the road to Marly, and thence proceeded to Paris with all possible diligence.

Day had long dawned before they reached the Bastille, and Philip, who was now excessively tired, never having ridden half the way in his life, was actually glad to arrive at the prison, which he had previously contemplated with so much horror.

Here he was delivered, and the lettre de cachet, and Chavigni's note, to the governor; and the servant again in his own hearing, recommended that he should be treated with all imaginable kindness, and allowed every liberty consistent with his safe custody.

All this convinced the woodcutter, as well as the conversation he had heard on the road, that Chavigni really meant well by him; and without any of those more refined feelings, which, however they may sometimes open the gates of the heart to the purest joys, but too often betray the fortress of the breast to the direst pains, he now felt comparatively secure, and gazed up at the massy walls and towers of the Bastille with awe indeed, but awe not unmingled with admiration.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE events which change the complexion of our whole being, and turn our joy into sorrow, or our sorrow into joy, are generally unforeseen in their coming, and brief in their transit, like those mysterious winged light-bearers, the comets, which dart across the earth's path towards the sun, and then plunging again into the depths of heaven, are lost before we can do aught but wonder and admire. This, therefore, shall be a short chapter, I am determined; because it is one of the most important in the whole book.

During the absence of the king and Chavigni in the chase, two arrivals had taken place at Chantilly very nearly at the same moment. Luckily, however, the queen had just time to alight from her carriage, and seek her apartments, before the Cardinal de Richelieu entered the courtyard, and she thus avoided an interview with her deadly enemy on the very threshold,—an interview, from which she might well have drawn an inauspicious augury, without even the charge of superstition.

As soon as Chavigni had (as far as possible) provided for his own safety by despatching the order for Philip's arrest, he proceeded to the apartments of Richelieu, and there he gave that minister an exact account of all he had heard, observed, and done; commenting particularly upon the violent and irascible mood of the king, and the advantages which might be thence derived, if they could turn his anger in the direction that they wished.

In the mean while Louis proceeded to the apartments of the queen, not indeed hurried on by any great affection for his wife, but desirous of seeing his children, whom he sincerely loved, notwithstanding the unaccountable manner in which he so frequently absented himself from them.

Never very attentive to dress, Louis the Thirteenth, when any thing disturbed or irritated him, neglected entirely the ordinary care of his person. In the present instance he made no change in his apparel, although the sports in which he had been engaged, had not left it in a very fit state to grace a drawing-room. Thus, in a pair of immense jack-boots, his hat pressed down upon his brows, and his whole dress soiled, deranged, and covered with dust, he presented himself in the saloon where Anne of Austria sat surrounded by the young princes and the ladies who had accompanied her to Chantilly.

The queen immediately rose to receive her husband, and advanced towards him with an air of gentle kindness, mixed with some degree of apprehension; for to her eyes, long accustomed to remark the various changes of his temper, the disarray of his apparel plainly indicated the irritation of his mind.

Louis saluted her but coldly, and without taking off his hat. "I am glad to see you well, madam," said he, and passed on to the nurse who held in her arms the young dauphin.

The child had not seen its father for some weeks, and now perceiving a rude-looking ill-dressed man, approaching hastily towards it, became frightened, hid its face on the nurse's shoulder, and burst into tears.

The rage of the king, at this expression of terror, broke the bounds of common decency.

"Ha!" exclaimed he, stamping on the ground with his heavy boot, till the whole apartment rang: "is it so, madam? Do you teach my children, also, to hate their father?"

"No, my lord, no, indeed!" replied Anne of Austria, in a tone of deep distress, seeing this unfortunate contre tems so strangely misconstrued to her disadvantage. "I neither teach the child to hate you, nor does he hate you; but you approached Louis hastily, and with your hat flapped over your eyes, so that he does not know you. Come hither, Louis," she continued, taking the dauphin out of the nurse's arms. "It is your father; do not you know him? Have I not always told you to love him?"

The dauphin looked at his mother, and then at the king, and perfectly old enough to comprehend what she said, he began to recognise his father, and held out his little arms towards him. But Louis turned angrily away.

"A fine lesson of dissimulation!" he exclaimed; and advanced towards his second son, who then bore the title of Duke of Anjou. "Ah, my little Philip," he continued, as the infant received him with a placid smile,—“you are not old enough to have learned any of these arts. You can love your father without being told to show it, like an ape at a puppet-show.”

At this new attack, the queen burst into tears.

"Indeed, indeed, my lord," she said, "you wrong me. Oh, Louis! how you might have made me love you once!" and her tears redoubled at the thought of the past. "But I am a weak fool," she continued, wiping the drops from her eyes, "to feel so sensibly what I do not deserve—At present your majesty does me deep injustice.—I have always taught both my children to love and respect their father. That name is the first word that they learn to pronounce; and from me they learn to pronounce it with affection. But oh, my liege! what will these dear children think in after years, when they see their father behave to their mother, as your majesty does towards me?"

"Pshaw!" exclaimed the king, "let us have no more of all this. I hate these scenes of altercation. Fear not, madam; the time will come, when these children will learn to appreciate us both thoroughly."

"I hope not, my lord"—replied the queen fervently—"I hope not. From me, at least, they shall never learn all I have to complain of in their father."

Had Anne of Austria reflected, she would have been silent; but it is the most difficult task that human firmness can accomplish, to refrain when urged by taunts and unmerited reproach. That excellent vial of water, which the Fairy bestowed upon the unhappy wife, is not always at hand to impede the utterance of rejoinders, which, like rejoinders in the Court of Chancery, only serve to urge on the strife a degree farther, whether they be right or wrong. In the present case the king's pale countenance flushed with anger. "Beware, madam, beware!" exclaimed he. "You have already been treated with too much lenity.—Remember the affair of Chalais!"

"Well, sir!" replied the queen, raising her head with an air of dignity: "Your majesty knows, and feels, and has said, that I am perfectly guiltless of that miserable plot. My lord, my lord! if you can lay your head upon your pillow conscious of innocence like mine, you will sleep well; my bosom at least is clear."

"See that it be, madam," replied Louis, darting upon her one of those fiery and terrible glances in which the whole vindictive soul of his Italian mother blazed forth in his eyes with the glare of a basilisk. "See that it be, madam; for there may come worse charges than that against you. I have learned from a sure source that a Spaniard is seeking my overthrow, and a woman is plotting my ruin" he continued, repeating the words of the astrologer; "that a prince is scheming my destruction, and a queen is betraying my trust—so, see that your bosom be clear, madam." And passing quickly by her, he left the apartment, exclaiming loud enough for all within it to hear, "Where is his Eminence of Richelieu? Some one, give him notice that the king desires his presence when he has leisure."

Anne of Austria clasped her hands in silence, and looking up to Heaven seemed for a moment to petition for support under the new afflictions she saw ready to fall upon her; and then without a comment on the painful scene that had just passed, returned to her ordinary employments.

CHAPTER XVIII.

In the old Chateau of Chantilly was a long gallery, which went by the name of the Cours aux cerfs, from the number of stags' heads which appeared curiously sculptured upon the frieze, with their long branching horns projecting from the wall, and so far extended on both sides as to cross each other and form an extraordinary sort of trellis-work architrave, before they reached the ceiling.

The windows of this gallery were far apart, and narrow admitting but little light into the interior, which, being of a dingy stone colour, could hardly have been rendered cheerful even by the brightest sunshine; but which, both from the smallness of the windows and the projection of a high tower on the other side of the court, was kept in continual shadow, except when in the longest days of summer the sun just passed the angle of the opposite building and threw a parting gleam through the last window, withdrawn as quickly as bestowed.

But at the time I speak of, namely, two days after the queen's arrival at Chantilly, no such cheering ray found entrance. It seemed, indeed, a fit place for melancholy imaginings; and to such sad purpose had Anne of Austria applied it. For some time she had been standing at one of the windows, leaning on the arm of Madame de Beaumont, and silently gazing with abstracted thoughts upon the open casements of the corridor on the other side, when the figures of Richelieu and Chavigni, passing by one of them, in their full robes, caught her eye; and withdrawing from the conspicuous situation in which she was placed, she remarked to the marchioness what she had seen, and observed that they must be going to the council-chamber.

Thus began a conversation which soon turned to the king, and to his strange conduct, which ever since their arrival had continued in an increasing strain of petulance and ill-temper.

"Indeed, madam," said the Marchioness de Beaumont, "your majesty's gentleness is misapplied. Far be it from me to urge aught against my king; but there be some dispositions to have their vehemence checked and repelled; and it is well also for themselves, when they meet with one who will oppose them firmly and boldly."

"Perhaps, De Beaumont," replied the queen, "if I had taken that course many years ago, it might have produced a happy effect; but now, alas! it would be in vain: and God knows whether it would have succeeded even then!"

As she spoke, the door of the gallery opened, and an officer of the council appeared, notifying to the queen that his majesty the king demanded her presence in the council-chamber.

Anne of Austria turned to Madame de Beaumont with a look of melancholy foreboding. "More, more, more still to endure," she said: and then added, addressing the officer, "his majesty's commands shall be instantly obeyed; so inform him, sir.—De Beaumont, tell Mademoiselle de Hauteford that I shall be glad of her assistance too. You will go with me of course."

Mademoiselle de Hauteford instantly came at the queen's command, and approaching her with a sweet and placid smile, said a few words of comfort to her royal mistress in so kind and gentle a manner, that the tears rose in the eyes of Anne of Austria.

"De Hauteford!" said she, "I feel a presentiment that we shall soon part, and therefore I speak to you now of what I never spoke before. I know how much I have to thank you for—I know how much you have rejected for my sake—The love of a king would have found few to refuse it. You have done so for my sake, and you will have your reward."

The eloquent blood spread suddenly over the beautiful countenance of the lady of honour. "Spare me, spare me, your majesty," cried she, kissing the hand the queen held out to her. "I thought that secret had been hidden in my bosom alone. But oh! let me hope that, even had it not been for my love for your majesty, I could still have resisted. "Yes! yes!" continued she, clasping her hands, and murmuring to herself the name of a higher and holier king, "yes! yes! I could have resisted!"

The unusual energy with which the beautiful girl spoke, on all ordinary occasions so calm and imperturbable, showed the queen how deeply her heart had taken part in that to which she alluded; and perhaps female curiosity might have led her to prolong the theme, though a painful one to both parties, had not the summons of the king required her immediate attention.

As they approached the council-chamber, Madame de Beaumont observed that the queen's steps wavered.

"Take courage, madam," said she. "For Heaven's sake, call up spirit to carry you through, whatever may occur."

"Fear not, De Beaumont," replied the queen, though her tone betrayed the apprehension she felt. "They shall see that they cannot frighten me."

At that moment the Huissier threw open the door of the council-chamber, and the queen with her ladies entered and found themselves in the presence of the king and all his principal ministers. In the centre of the room, strewn with various papers and materials for writing, stood a long table, at the top of which, in a seat slightly raised above the rest, sat Louis himself, dressed, as was usual with him, in a suit of black silk, without any ornament whatever, except three rows of sugar-loaf buttons of polished jet;—if these could be considered as ornamental. His hat, indeed, which he continued to wear, was looped up with a small string of jewels; and the feather, which fell much on one side, was buttoned with a diamond of some value; but these were the only indications by which his apparel could have been distinguished from that of some poor avoué, or greffier de la cour.

On the right-hand of the king was placed the Cardinal de Richelieu, in his robes; and on the left, was the Chancellor Seguier. Bouthilliers, Chavigni, Mazarin, and other members of the council, filled the rest of the seats round the table; but at the farther end was a vacant space, in front of which the queen now presented herself, facing the chair of the king.

There was an angry spot on Louis's brow, and as Anne of Austria, entered, he continued playing with the hilt of his sword, without once raising his eyes towards her. The queen's heart sank, but still she bore an undismayed countenance, while the cardinal fixed upon her the full glance of his dark commanding eyes, and rising from his seat, slightly inclined his head at her approach.

The rest of the council rose, and Chavigni turned away his eyes, with an ill-defined sensation of pain and regret; but the more subtle Mazarin, ever watchful to court good opinion, whether for present, or for future purposes, glided quietly round, and placed a chair for her at the table. It was an action not forgotten in after days.

A moment's pause ensued. As soon as the queen was seated, Richelieu glanced his eye towards the countenance of the king, as if to instigate him to open the business of the day: but Louis's attention was deeply engaged in his sword-knot, or at least seemed to be so, and the cardinal was at length forced to proceed himself.

"Your majesty's presence has been desired by the king, who is like a God in justice and in equity," said Richelieu, proceeding in that bold and figurative style, in which all his public addresses were conceived, "in order to enable you to cast off, like a raiment that has been soiled by a foul touch, the accusations which have been secretly made against you, and to explain some part of your conduct, which, as clouds between the earth and the sun, have come between yourself and your royal husband, intercepting the beams of his princely approbation. All this your majesty can doubtless do, and the king has permitted the council to hear your exculpation from your own lips, that we may trample under our feet the foul suspicions that appear against you."

"Lord Cardinal," replied the queen, calmly, but firmly, "I wonder at the boldness of your language. Remember, sir, whom it is that you thus presume to address—the wife of your sovereign, sir, who sits there, bound to protect her from insult and from injury."

"Cease, cease, madam!" cried Louis, breaking silence. "First prove yourself innocent, and then use the high tone of innocence, if you will."

"To you, my lord," replied the queen, "I am ready to answer every thing, truly and faithfully, as a good wife, and a good subject; but not to that audacious vassal, who, in oppressing and insulting me, but degrades your authority and weakens your power."

"Spare your invectives, madam," said the cardinal calmly; "for, if I be not much mistaken, before you leave this chamber you will be obliged to acknowledge all that is contained in the paper before me; in which case, the bad opinion of your majesty, would be as the roar of idle wind, that hurteth not the mariner on shore."

"My lord and sovereign," said the queen, addressing Louis, without deigning to notice the cardinal, "it seems that some evil is laid to my charge; will you condescend to inform me of what crime I am accused, that now calls your majesty's anger upon me?—If loving you too well,—if lamenting your frequent absence from me,—if giving my whole time and care to your children, be no crimes, tell me, my lord, tell me what I have done."

"What you have done, madam, is easily told," exclaimed Louis, his eyes flashing fire. "Give me that paper, lord cardinal;" and passing hastily from article to article of its contents, he continued: "Have you not, contrary to my express command, and the command of the council, corresponded with Philip of Spain? Have you not played the spy upon the plans of my government, and caused the defeat of my armies in Flanders, the losses of the protestants in Germany, the failure of all our schemes in Italy, by the information you have conveyed? Have you not written to Don Francisco de Mello, and your cousin the arch-duke? Have you not——”

“Never, never!” exclaimed the queen, clasping her hands, “never, so help me Heaven!”

“What!” cried Louis, dashing the paper angrily upon the table. “Darest thou deny what is as evident as the sun in the noonday sky? Remember, madam, that your minion, De Blénau, is in the Bastille, and will soon forfeit his life upon the scaffold, if his obstinacy does not make him die under the question.”

“For poor De Blénau’s sake, my lord,” replied the queen,—“for the sake of as noble, and as innocent a man as ever was the victim of tyranny, I will tell you at once, that I have written to Philip of Spain—my own dear brother. And who can blame me, my lord, for loving one who has always loved me? But I knew my duty better than ever once to mention even the little that I knew of the public affairs of this kingdom: and far less, your majesty, did I pry into secret plans of state policy for the purpose of divulging them. My letters, my lord, were wholly domestic. I spoke of myself, of my husband, of my children; I spoke as a woman, a wife, and a mother; but never, my lord, as a queen; and never, never as a spy.

“As to De Blénau, my lord, let me assure you, that before he undertook to forward those letters, he exacted from me a promise, that they should never contain any thing which could impeach his honour, or his loyalty. This, my lord, is all my crime, and this is the extent of his.”

There was a degree of simplicity and truth in the manner of the queen, which operated strongly on the mind of Louis. “But who,” said he, “will vouch that those letters contain nothing treasonable? We have but your word, madam; and you well know that we are at war with Spain, and cannot procure a sight of the originals.”

“Luckily,” replied Anne of Austria, her countenance

brightening with a ray of hope, "they have all been read by one whom your majesty yourself recommended to my friendship. Clara de Hauteford, you have seen them all. Speak ! Tell the king the nature of their contents without fear and without favour."

Mademoiselle de Hauteford advanced from behind the queen's chair ; and the king, who, it was generally believed, had once passionately loved her, but had met with no return, now fixed his eyes intently upon the pale, beautiful creature, that, scarcely like a being of the earth, glided silently forward and placed herself directly opposite to him. Clara de Hauteford was devotedly attached to the queen. Whether it sprang from that sense of duty which in general governed all her actions, or whether it was personal attachment, matters little, as the effect was the same, and she would, at no time, have considered her life too great a sacrifice to the interest of her mistress.

She advanced then before the council, knowing that the happiness, if not the life of Anne of Austria, might depend upon her answer ; and clasping her snowy hands together, she raised her eyes towards heaven, "So help me God at my utmost need !" she said, with a clear, slow, energetic utterance, "no line that I have ever seen of her majesty's writing—and I believe I have seen almost all she has written within the last five years—no line that I have seen, ever spoke any thing but the warmest attachment to my lord the king ; nor did any ever contain the slightest allusion to the politics of this kingdom, but were confined entirely to the subject of her domestic life ;—nor even then," she continued, dropping her full blue eyes to the countenance of the king, and fixing them there, with a calm serious determined gaze, which overpowered the glance of the monarch, and made his eyelid fall—"nor even then did they ever touch upon her domestic sorrows."

Richelieu saw that the king was moved : he knew also the influence of Mademoiselle de Hauteford, and he instantly resolved upon crushing her by one of those bold acts of power which he had so often attempted with impunity. Nor had he much hesitation in the present instance, knowing that Louis's superstitious belief in the predictions of the astrologer had placed the monarch's mind completely under his dominion. "Mademoiselle de Haute-ford," said he in a stern voice, "answer me. Have you seen all the letters that the queen has written to her brother, Philip King of Spain, positively knowing them to be such?"

"So please your eminence, I have," replied Mademoiselle de Haute-ford.

"Well then," said Richelieu, rising haughtily from his chair while he spoke, "in so doing you have committed misprision of treason, and are therefore banished from this court and kingdom for ever; and if, within sixteen days from this present, you have not removed yourself from the precincts of the realm, you shall be considered guilty of high treason, and arraigned as such; inasmuch as, according to your own confession, you have knowingly and wilfully, after a decree in council against it, concealed and abetted a correspondence between persons within the kingdom of France, and a power declaredly its enemy."

As the cardinal uttered his sentence in a firm, deep, commanding voice, the king, who had at first listened to him with a look of surprise, and perhaps of anger, soon began to feel the habitual superiority of Richelieu, and shrunk back into himself, depressed and overawed: the queen pressed her hand before her eyes; and Chavigni half raised himself, as if to speak, but instantly resumed his seat as his eye met that of the cardinal.

It was Mademoiselle de Haute-ford alone that heard her condemnation without apparent emotion. She merely bowed her head with a look of the most perfect resignation. "Your eminence's will shall be obeyed," she replied, "and may a gracious God protect my innocent mistress!" Thus saying, she again took her place behind the queen's chair, with hardly a change of countenance—always pale, perhaps her face was a little paler, but the alteration was scarcely perceptible.

"And now," continued Richelieu in the same proud manner, assuming at once that power which he in reality possessed,— "and now let us proceed to the original matter, from which we have been diverted to sweep away a butterfly. Your majesty confesses yourself guilty of treason, in corresponding with the enemies of the kingdom.

I hold in my hand a paper to that effect, or something very similar, all drawn from irrefragable evidence upon the subject. This you may as well sign, and on that condition no further notice shall be taken of the affair; but the matter shall be forgotten as an error in judgment."

"I have not confessed myself guilty of treason, arrogant prelate," replied the queen, "and I have not corresponded with Philip of Spain as an enemy of France, but as my own brother. Nor will I, while I have life, sign a paper so filled with falsehoods as any one must be that comes from your hand."

"Your majesty sees!" said Richelieu, turning to the king, from whom the faint sparks of energy he had lately shown were now entirely gone. "Is there any medium to be kept with a person so convicted of error, and so obstinate in the wrong? And is such a person fit to educate the children of France? Your majesty has promised that the dauphin and the Duke of Anjou shall be given into my charge."

"I have," said the weak monarch, "and I will keep my promise."

"Never! never!" cried the queen vehemently—"never, while Anne of Austria lives! Oh, my lord!" she exclaimed, advancing, and casting herself at the feet of the king with all the overpowering energy of maternal love, "consider that I am their mother!—Rob me not of my only hope,—rob me not of those dear children who have smiled and cheered me through all my sorrows. Oh, Louis! if you have the feelings of a father, if you have the feelings of a man, spare me this!"

The king turned away his head, and Richelieu, gliding behind the throne, placed himself at the queen's side. "Sign the paper," said he in a low deep tone, "sign the paper, and they shall not be taken from you."

"Any thing! any thing! but leave me my children!" exclaimed the queen, taking the pen he offered her. "Have I your promise?"

"You have," replied he decidedly. "They shall not be taken from you."

"Well, then," said Anne of Austria, receiving the paper, "I will sign it; but I call Heaven to witness that am innocent! and you, gentlemen of the council, to see that I sign a paper, the contents of which I know not, and part of which is certainly false." Thus saying, with a rapid hand she wrote her name at the bottom of the page, threw down the pen and quitted the apartment.

The queen walked slowly, and in silence, to the apartments allotted to her use, without giving way to the various painful feelings that struggled in her bosom; but once arrived within the shelter of her own saloon, she sank into a chair, and burst into a flood of tears. Mademoiselle de Hauteford, who stood beside her, endeavoured in vain for some time to calm her agitation, but at length succeeding in a degree,—

"Oh, Clara!" said the queen, "you have ruined yourself for my sake."

"I hope, madam," replied the young lady, "that I have done my duty, which were enough in itself to reconcile me to my fate; but if I could suppose that I have served your majesty, I should be more than rewarded for any thing I may undergo."

"You have served me most deeply on this and every occasion," answered the queen; "and the time may come, when the affection of Anne of Austria will not be what it is now,—the destruction of all that possess it. —But why comes Mademoiselle de Beaumont in such haste?" she continued, as Pauline, who had been absent in the gardens of the palace, and unconscious of all that had lately passed, entered the saloon with hurry and anxiety in her countenance.

"Please your majesty," said Pauline, and then suddenly stopped, seeing that the queen had been weeping.

"Proceed, proceed! wild rose," said Anne of Austria; "they are but tears—drops that signify nothing."

"As I was walking in the gardens but now," continued Pauline, "a little peasant-boy came up to me, and asked if I could bring him to speech of your majesty. I was surprised at his request, and asked him what was his business; when he told me that he brought you a letter from the Bastille. This seemed so important that I made bold to take him into the palace by the private gate, and concealed him in my apartments, till I had informed you of it all."

"You did right, Pauline, you did right," replied the queen. "It must surely be news from De Blénau. Bring the boy hither directly—not by the anteroom, but by the inner apartments.—You, Clara, station Laporte at the top of the staircase, to see that no one approaches."

Pauline flew to execute the queen's commands, and in a few minutes a clatter was heard in the inner chamber, not at all unlike the noise produced by that most unfortunate animal a cat, when some mischievous boys adorn her feet with walnut-shells.

The moment after, the door opened, and Pauline appeared leading in a fine curly-headed boy of about ten years old. He was dressed in hodden gray, with a broad leathern belt round his waist, in which appeared a small axe and a knife, while his feet, displaying no stockings, but with the skin tanned to the colour of Russian leather, were thrust into a pair of unwieldy sabots, or wooden-shoes, which had caused the clatter aforesaid.

"Take off his sabots, take off his sabots," cried the queen, putting her hands to her ears. "They will alarm the whole house."

"Dame, oui!" cried the boy slipping his feet out of their encumbrances. "J'avais oublié, et vous aussi, Mademoiselle," turning to Pauline, who, anxious to hear of De Blénau, would have let him come in, if he had been shod like a horse.

The little messenger now paused for a moment, then having glanced his eye over the ladies at the other end of the room, as if to ascertain to which he was to deliver his credentials, advanced straight to the queen, and falling down upon both his knees, tendered her a sealed packet.

"Well, my boy," said Anne of Austria, taking the letter, "whom does this come from?"

"My father, the woodman of Mantes," replied the boy, "told me to give it into the queen's own hand; and when I had done so, to return straight to him and not to wait, for fear of being discovered."

"And how do you know that I am the queen?" asked Anne of Austria, who too often suffered her mind to be distracted from matters of grave importance by trifling objects of amusement. "That lady is the queen," she continued, pointing to Madame de Beaumont, and playing upon the boy's simplicity.

"No, no," said Charles the woodman's son, "she stands and you sit; and besides, you told them to take of my sabots, as if you were used to order all about you."

"Well," rejoined the queen, "you are right, my boy: go back to your father, and as a token that you have given the letter to the queen, carry him back that ring;" and she took a jewel from her finger, and put it into the boy's hand. "Mademoiselle de Beaumont," she continued, "will you give this boy into the charge of Laporte, bidding him take him from the palace* by the most private way, and not to leave him till he is safe out of Chantilly?"

According to Anne of Austria's command, Pauline conducted Charles to the head of the staircase, at which had been stationed Laporte, the confidential servant of the queen, keeping watch to give notice of any one's approach. To him she delivered her charge with the proper directions, and then returned to the saloon, not a little anxious to learn the contents of De Blénau's letter. I will not try to explain her sensations. Let those who have been parted from some one that they love, who have been anxious for his safety, and terrified for his danger, who have waited in fear and agony for tidings long delayed—let them call up all that they felt, and tinging it with that shade of romance, which might be expected in the mind of a young, feeling, imaginative Languedocian girl of 1643, they will have something like a picture of Pauline's sensations, without my helping them a bit.

"Come hither, my wild rose," said the queen, as she saw her enter. "Here is a letter from De Blénau, full of sad news indeed. His situation is perilous in the extreme; and though I am the cause of all, I do not know how to aid him."

Pauline turned pale, but cast down her eyes, and remained without speaking.

"Surely, Pauline," said the queen, misinterpreting her silence, "after the explanations I gave you some days ago, you can have no further doubt of De Blènaux's conduct?"

"On no, indeed! madam," replied Pauline, vehemently, "and now that I feel and know how very wrong those suspicions were, I would fain do something to atone for having formed them."

"Thou canst do nothing, my poor flower," said the queen, with a melancholy smile. "However, read the letter, and thou wilt see that something must soon be done to save him, or his fate is sealed. De Blènaux must be informed that I have acknowledged writing to my brother, and all the particulars connected therewith; for well I know that Richelieu will not be contented with my confession, but will attempt to wring something more from him, even by the peine forte et dure."

Pauline read, and re-read the letter, and each time she did so the colour came and went in her cheek, and at every sentence she raised her large dark eyes to the queen, as if inquiring what could be done for him. Each of the queen's ladies was silent for a time, and then each proposed some plan, which was quickly discussed and rejected, as either too dangerous, or totally impracticable. One proposed to bribe the governor of the Bastille to convey a letter to De Blènaux, but that was soon rejected: another proposed to send Laporte, the queen's valet de chambre, to try and gain admittance; but Laporte had once been confined there himself, and was well known to all the officers of the prison: another mentioned Seguin, Anne of Austria's surgeon; but he likewise was too well known, and it also appeared, from what De Blènaux had informed the queen of his conference with Richelieu, that the very words of the message which had been sent by him on the night of the young count's rencounter with the robbers had been communicated to the cardinal, and the whole party forgot that Louise, the soubrette, had been present when it was delivered.

In the mean while, Pauline remained profoundly silent, occupied by many a bitter reflection, while a thousand confused schemes flitted across her mind, like bubbles floating on a stream, and breaking as soon as they were looked upon. At length, however, she started, as if some more feasible plan presented itself to her thoughts—"I will go!" exclaimed she.—"Please your majesty, I will go."

"You, Pauline!" said the queen, "you my poor girl! You know not the difficulties of such an undertaking. What say you, Madame de Beaumont?"

"That I am pleased, madam, to see my child show forth the spirit of her race," replied the marchioness. "Nor do I doubt of her success; for sure I am Pauline would not propose a project which had no good foundation."

"Then say how you intend to manage it," said the queen, with little faith in the practicability of Pauline's proposal. "I doubt me much, my sweet girl, they will never let you into the Bastille. Their hearts are as hard as the stones of the prison that they keep, and they will give you no ingress for love of your bright eyes."

"I do not intend to make that a plea," replied Pauline, smiling in youthful confidence; "but I will borrow one of my maid's dresses, and doubtless shall look as like a soubrette as any one.* Claude directs us, here, to ask at the gate for Philip the woodman of Mantes. Now he will most likely be able to procure me admission; and if not, I can but give the message to him and be sent away again."

"Oh, no, no!" cried the queen, "give no messages but in the last extremity. How do we know that this woodman might not betray us, and raise Richelieu's suspicions still more? If you can see De Blénau, well—I will give you a letter for him; but if not, only tell the woodman to inform him, that I have confessed all. If that reach the tyrant's ears, it can do no harm. Your undertaking is bold, Pauline: think you your courage will hold out?"

The boundaries between emulation and jealousy are very frail, and Madame de Beaumont, who regarded the services which Mademoiselle de Hauteford had rendered the queen with some degree of envy, now answered for her daughter's courage with more confidence than perhaps she felt. But Pauline's plan yet required great arrangement, even to give it the probability of success. With a thousand eyes continually upon their actions, it was no very easy matter even to quit Chantilly without calling down that observation and inquiry which would have been fatal to their project.

To obviate this difficulty, it was agreed that Pauline should accompany Mademoiselle de Hauteford, whose sentence of banishment required her immediate presence in Paris, for the arrangement of her affairs. On their arrival in that city, the two ladies were to take up their abode with the old Marchioness de Senecy, one of the queen's most devoted adherents, and to determine their future proceedings by the information they received upon the spot.

The greatest rapidity was necessary to any hope of success, and neither Pauline nor Mademoiselle de Hauteford lost any time in their preparations. The queen's letter to De Blénau was soon written. Pauline borrowed from her maid Louise, the full dress of a Languedoc peasant, provided herself with a considerable sum of money, that no means might be left untried, and having taken leave of her mother, whose bold counsels tended to raise her spirits and uphold her resolution, she placed herself in the chaise roulante beside Mademoiselle de Hauteford, buoyed up with youthful confidence and enthusiasm.

It was rather an anxious moment as they passed the gates of the palace, which by some accident were shut. This caused a momentary delay, and several of the cardinal's guard (for Richélieu assumed that of a body-guard amongst other marks of royalty) gathered round the vehicle with the idle curiosity of an unemployed soldiery. Pauline's heart beat fast, but the moment after she was relieved by the appearance of the old concierge, or porter, who threw open the gates, and the carriage rolled out without any question being asked. Her mind, however, was not wholly relieved till they were completely free of the town of Chantilly, and till the carriage slowly mounting the first little hill, took a slight turn to avoid a steeper ascent, showing them the towers of the chateau and the course of the road they had already passed, without any human form that could afford subject for alarm.

Pauline, seeing that they were not followed, gave herself up to meditations of the future, firmly believing that their departure had entirely escaped the observation of the cardinal. But this was not the case. He had been early informed that one of the queen's carriages was in preparation to carry some of the ladies of honour to Paris; but concluding that it was nothing more than the effect of that sentence of banishment which he had himself pronounced against Mademoiselle de Hauteфорд, he suffered Pauline and her companion to depart without inquiry or obstruction; although some of the many tools of his power had shut the palace-gates, as if by accident, till his decision was known.

As the carriage rolled on, and Pauline reflected in silence upon the task she had undertaken, the bright colouring of the moment's enthusiasm faded away; the mists in which hope had concealed the rocks and precipices around her path no longer intercepted her view, and the whole difficulties and dangers to which she exposed herself, presented themselves one after another to her sight. But the original motives still remained in full force. Her deep romantic attachment to De Blénau, her sense of duty to the queen, and that generosity of purpose which would have led her at any time to risk her life to save the innocent—much more the innocent and loved—of these, nothing could deprive her; and these kept up her resolution, although the very interest which her heart took in the success of her endeavour, made her magnify the dangers, and tremble at the thought of failure.

CHAPTER XIX.

As a young member of what is technically called the lower house, or otherwise the House of Commons, when first he goes down after his election to take the oaths and his seat, his heart fluttering both with pride and timidity, most conscientiously resolves to be independent in all his opinions, and determines heroically to have no party; so had I, when I entered upon the arduous duties of giving this work to the public in its present form, determined heroically to have no hero; but to do equal justice to all the several characters, and let each reader find a hero for himself.

However, pursuing the course of the above-mentioned young member of the Commons House of Parliament, who soon begins to perceive, that it is as easy to eat oysters and brown sugar, as to vote with a party to whom he has a natural antipathy; or for the needle to fly from the magnet, as for him to keep aloof from that faction to which individual interests, long-indulged habits, and early prejudices attach him; so, I soon began to find that my own feelings more particularly inclining me to the Count de Blénau, I unconsciously made him the hero of my tale, dilated on his history, enlarged upon his character, quitted him with regret, and returned to him with pleasure.

At present, the course of my tale naturally conducts me once more to the gloomy walls of the Bastille, to give some account of the circumstances which led to the latter events of the last chapter; and consequently I feel no hesitation in once more taking up the history of my hero.

The sleep of the Count de Blénau was fully as sound within the Bastille as ever it had been in his own hotel at St. Germain: nor was it till the day had risen high that he awoke, on the first morning after his imprisonment.

It was some moments before he could remember his precise situation, so profound had been his sleep. But the unpleasant parts of our fate soon recall themselves to our senses, though we may forget them for a time; and the narrow windows, the iron door, and the untapestried walls, speedily brought back to De Blénau's recollection many a painful particular, to which sleep had given a temporary oblivion.

On rising, he missed in some degree the attendance to which he was accustomed; but nevertheless he contrived to get through the business of the toilet, without much difficulty; although no page was ready at his call, no groom prepared to adjust every part of his apparel. He then proceeded into the outer chamber, which he mentally termed his saloon, and would willingly have ordered his breakfast, but his apartments afforded no means of communicating with those below, except by the iron door already mentioned; the secret of which was of too great importance to be lost upon so trifling an occasion.

No remedy presented itself but patience, and proceeding to the window, which opened at will to admit the air, but which was strongly secured on the outside with massy iron bars, he endeavoured to amuse the time by looking into the court below, in which he could occasionally catch a glimpse of some of his fellow-prisoners, appearing and disappearing, as they sometimes emerged into the open space within his sight, and sometimes retired into the part, which the thickness of the walls in which the window was placed, hid from his view.

They were now apparently taking their morning's walk, and enjoying the privilege of conversing with each other—a privilege which De Blénau began to value more highly than ever he had done. Amongst those that he beheld were many whom he recognised—having either known them personally, or having seen them at the court, or with the army: and the strange assemblage of all different parties which met his eye in the courtyard of the Bastille, fully convinced him, that under the administration of a man who lived in constant fear that his ill-gotten power would be snatched from him, safety was to be found in no tenets and in no station.

Here he beheld some that had been of the party of Mary de Medicis, and some who had been the avowed followers of Richelieu himself; some that the minister suspected of being too much favoured by the king, and some, as in his own case, who had been attached to the queen. One he saw who was supposed to have favoured the Huguenots in France, and one that had assisted the catholic party in Germany.

"Well," thought De Blénau, "I am but one out of the many, and whatever plan I had pursued, most probably I should have found my way here somehow. Wealth and influence, in despotic governments, are generally like the plumes of the ostrich, which often cause her to be hunted down, but will not help her to fly."

Whilst engaged in such reflections, De Blénau heard the bolts of the door undrawn, and the governor of the prison entered, followed by his servant loaded with the various requisites for so substantial a meal as a breakfast of that period. De Blénau and the governor saluted each other with every outward form of civility; and the count, perceiving that his custodier still lingered after the servant had disposed the various articles upon the table and had taken his departure, luckily remembered that this was one of the jours maigres of which he had heard, and invited his companion to partake of his morning meal. The governor agreed to the proposal sans cérémonie, and having done ample justice to the dish of stewed partridges which formed the principal ornament of the table, he himself finished a bottle of the celebrated wine of Suresnes which is one of the things now lost to the bons vivants of Paris.

De Blénau was not so much importuned by hunger as to envy the governor the very large share he appropriated of the viands before him; and he had plenty of leisure to remark, that his companion performed his feats of mastication with a wonderful degree of velocity. But the governor had a reason for thus wishing to hurry, what was to him a very agreeable occupation, to its conclusion; for he had scarcely poured out the last goblet of his wine, and was still wiping and folding up his case-knife (which, by the way, was the constant companion of high and low in those days, and the only implement they had for cutting their food), when the door opened, and a servant appeared, giving the governor a significant nod, which was answered by a sign of the same kind. .

Upon this the man retired, and the door being closed, the well-filled official turned to De Blénau,—“ I did not tell you before, Monsieur le Comte,” said he, “ for fear of taking away your appetite ; but we have had a message this morning from Monsieur Lafemas—you have heard of Monsieur Lafemas, doubtless?—importing that he would soon be here to put some questions to you. Now, Monsieur de Blénau, you are a gentleman for whom I have a great regard, and I will give you a hint which may be of service to you. If in the examination which you are about to undergo, there be any questions to which you do not find it convenient to reply, do not refuse to answer them, but speak always in such a manner as to bear two interpretations, by which means I have known many a prisoner avoid the torture, and sometimes go on from examination to examination, till they gave him his liberty from pure weariness.”

De Blénau bowed, already determined as to the course he should pursue. “ When do you expect this worthy judge ?” he demanded. “ I am perfectly unconcerned as to his coming, let me assure you, though I feel obliged by your consideration for my appetite.”

“ He is here now, sir,” replied the governor ; “ we had better, if you please, join him in the audience-hall. That servant came to announce his arrival.”

“ I will follow you instantly,” replied the count ; upon which the governor rose and opened the door.

The moment De Blénau had passed out, the guard, who had been stationed at the head of the stairs, followed at the distance of a couple of paces, while the governor led the way. In this order they proceeded to the inner court, which they had to pass before they could reach the audience-chamber. This open space was still filled by the prisoners, who, glad of the little liberty allowed them, seldom retired to their cells, except when obliged by the regulations of the prison. The moment De Blénau appeared in the court, there was a slight stir amongst its tenants, and the question of, "Who is he? who is he?" circulated rapidly among them.

"It is the Count de Blénau, by St. Louis!" exclaimed a deep voice, which De Blénau remembered to have heard somewhere before; but, though on looking round he saw several persons that he knew, he could not fix upon any one in particular as the one who had spoken.

He had not time, however, for more than a momentary glance, and was obliged to pass on to the door of the audience-hall, which opened into a little narrow passage leading from the court. Here De Blénau paused for an instant to collect his thoughts, and then followed the governor, who had already entered.

The audience-hall of the Bastille was a large oblong chamber, dimly lighted by two high Gothic windows, which looked into the outer court. The scanty gleam of daylight which would have thus entered, had the space been open, was impeded by the dust and dirt of many a century, and by the thick crossing of the leaden framework, while its progress into the hall itself was also further obstructed by several heavy columns which supported the high pointed arches of the roof.

This roof—the apartment having been originally intended for the chapel—would have afforded a relief to the dullness of the rest by its beautiful proportions, and the highly-finished tracery with which it was adorned, had the eye been able to reach it; but the rays, which from the causes above mentioned were barely enough to illuminate the lower part of the hall, were lost before they could attain its height, leaving it in that profound obscurity, which cast a double gloom upon the space below.

The pavement of this melancholy hall was damp and decayed, many of the stones having strayed from their bed of mortar, and become vagrant about the apartment; and the furniture, if it might be so called, far from filling it, served only to show its size and emptiness. At the farther extremity was a long table, at the end of which in a chair somewhat elevated, sat the judge Lafemas, with a clerk at a desk below him, and two or three exempts standing round about.

Near the end next De Blènaux was another chair, which he conceived to be placed for his use; while between two of the pillars, sitting on a curious machine, the use of which De Blènaux at once suspected, appeared an ill-favoured muscular old man, whose lowering brow and doggedness of aspect seemed to speak of many a ruthless deed.

As the count entered, the door closed after him with a loud clang; and advancing to the table, he took his seat in the vacant chair, while the governor placed himself at a little distance between him and the judge.

"Well, Monsieur de Blènaux," said Lafemas in that sweet mild tone which he always assumed when not irritated by the taunts of Chavigni, "this is the last place where I could have wished to meet a nobleman whose general character has always engaged my most affectionate esteem."

De Blènaux knew Lafemas to be one of the meanest and most viperous of the cardinal's tools, and not feeling much moved to exchange courtesies with him, he merely acknowledged the judge's salutation by a silent bow, while the other proceeded: "I have requested the pleasure of your society for a space, in order to ask you a few questions; your reply to which will, doubtless, soon procure your liberation from this unpleasant place."

"I trust so, sir," replied the count, "as the detention of an innocent person must occasion fully as much discredit to His majesty's government, as it does inconvenience to the person himself."

"You are quite right, you are quite right," rejoined the sweet-tongued judge. "Indeed, my very object in coming is to obtain such answers from you as will convince the Cardinal de Richelieu, who, though a profound minister, is somewhat suspicious withal,—to convince him, I say, that you are innocent; of which, on my conscience, and as I believe in the Saviour, I have no doubt myself. In the first place, then," he continued, "tell me as a friend, have you any acquaintance in Brussels?"

"I have!" replied De Blénau decidedly.

"That is honourable—that is candid," said the judge. "I told you, Monsieur le Gouverneur, that we should have no difficulty, and that Monsieur de Blénau would enable me easily to establish his innocence.—Pray do you correspond with these friends?" he continued, "and by what means?"

"I do correspond with them; but seldom, and then by any means that occur."

"Monsieur de Blénau," exclaimed Lafemas, "I am enchanted with this frankness; but be a little more specific about the means. If you have no particular objection to confide in me, mention any channel that you call to mind, by which you have sent letters to the Low Countries."

De Blénau felt somewhat disgusted with the sweet and friendly manner of a man whose deeds spoke him as cruel and as bloody-minded as a famished tiger; and unwilling to be longer mocked with soft words, he replied, "Sometimes by the king's courier, sir; sometimes by the cardinal's: and once I remember having sent one by your cousin De Merceau, but I believe that letter never reached its destination; for you must recollect that De Merceau was hanged by Don Francisco de Mello, for ripping open the bag and purloining the despatches."

"We have nothing to do with that, my dear count," said Lafemas struggling to maintain his placidity of demeanour.—"The next thing I have to inquire is,"—and he looked at a paper he held in his hand: "Have you ever conveyed any letters to the Low Countries for any one else?"

De Blénau answered in the affirmative; and the judge proceeded with a series of questions, very similar to those which had been asked by Richelieu himself, artfully striving to entangle the prisoner by means of his own admissions, so as to force him into further confessions by the impossibility of receding. But beyond a certain point De Blénau would not proceed.

"Monsieur Lafemas," said he in a calm tone, "I perceive that you are going into questions which have already been asked me by his eminence the cardinal prime minister. The object in doing so is evidently to extort from me some contradiction which may criminate myself; and therefore henceforward I will reply to no such questions whatsoever. The cardinal is in possession of my answers; and if you want them, you must apply to him."

"You mistake entirely, my dear count," said Lafemas; "on my salvation, my only object is to serve you. You have already acknowledged that you have forwarded letters from the queen,—why not now inform me to whom those letters were addressed? If those letters were not of a treasonable nature, why did she not send them by one of her own servants?"

"When a Queen of France is not allowed the common attendants which a simple gentlewoman can demand, she may often be glad to use the servants and services of her friends. My own retinue, sir, trebles that which the queen has ever possessed at St. Germain. But, without going into these particulars, your question is at once replied to by reminding you, that I am her majesty's chamberlain, and therefore her servant."

"Without there were something wrong, Monsieur de Blénau," said Lafemas, "you could have no objection to state whether you have or have not conveyed some letters from her majesty to Don John of Austria, Don Francisco de Mello, or King Philip of Spain. It is very natural for a queen to write to her near relations, surely."

"I have already said," replied De Blénau, "that I shall reply to no such questions, the object of which is alone to entangle me."

"You know not what you are exposing yourself to," rejoined the judge; "there are means within this prison which would easily compel an answer."

"None," replied De Blénau, firmly. "My resolution is taken, and no power on earth can shake it."

"Really, Monsieur de Blénau, it would hurt me to the heart to leave you to the dreadful fate which your mistaken determination is likely to call upon you. I could weep—truly I could weep, to think of what you are calling upon your own head;" and the judge glanced his eye towards the machine, which we have already noticed, and from which the old man rose up, as if preparing for his task.

"You mean the torture?" said De Blè nau, looking at it without a change of countenance. "But let me tell you, Monsieur Lafemas, that you dare not order it to a man of my rank, without an express warrant for the purpose; and, even if you had such authority, not all the torture in the world would wring one word from me. Ask that instrument of tyranny, sir," and he pointed to the executioner,—“ask him how the noble Caply died; and so would De Blè nau also.”

Lafemas looked at the governor, and the governor at the executioner, and so round. One of the dreadful secrets of the Bastille had evidently escaped beyond those precincts to which they were fearfully confined; no one could divine how this had occurred, and each suspected the other. A temporary silence ensued, and then Lafemas proceeded:

"The torture! no, Monsieur de Blè nau: God forbid that I should think of ordering such a thing! But let me advise you to answer; for I must, of course, report your refusal to the cardinal prime minister, and you know that he is not likely to consider either your rank or your fortune, but will, in all probability, order you the question ordinary and extraordinary instantly."

"The guilt be his then!" said De Blè nau. "I have already told you my resolution, sir; act upon it as you think fit."

Lafemas seemed at a loss, and a whispering consultation took place between him and the secretary, who seemed to urge more vigorous measures than the judge himself thought proper to pursue; for their conference was terminated by Lafemas exclaiming in a tone not sufficiently low to escape De Blè nau's ear, "I dar not, I tell you—I dare not—I have no orders.—Monsieur de Blè nau," he continued aloud, "you may now retire, and I must report your answers to the cardinal. Bu let me advise you, as a sincere friend, to be prepared with a reply to the questions you have now refused to answer, before we next meet; for by that time I shall have received his eminence's commands, which, I fear, will be more severe than my heart could wish."

De Blénau made no reply, but withdrew, escorted as before; and it were needless to deny that, notwithstanding the coolness with which he had borne his examination, and the fortitude with which he was prepared to repel the worst that could be inflicted, his heart beat high as the door of the audience-hall closed behind him, and he looked forward to returning to his apartments with more pleasure than a captive usually regards the place of his confinement.

The many agitating circumstances which had passed since, had completely banished, from his thoughts the voice which he had heard pronounce his name, on the first time of his crossing the court; but as he returned, his eye fell upon the form of a tall, strong man, standing under the archway; and he instantly recognised the woodman of the forest of Mantes.

De Blénau had spoken to him a thousand times in his various hunting-excursions, and he could not help being astonished to meet him in such a place, little dreaming that he himself was the cause. "What, in the name of Heaven!" thought he, "can that man have done to merit confinement here? Surely, Richelieu, who affects to be an eagle of the highest flight, might stoop on nobler prey than that!"

As these thoughts crossed his mind, he passed by the foot of the little tower, containing the staircase which communicated with his apartments by the iron door in the inner chamber. This had evidently been long disused; and on remembering the position of the two chambers which he occupied, he conceived that they must have been at one time quite distinct, with a separate entrance to each, the one being arrived at by the turret, and the other by the chief staircase. He had, however, only time to take a casual glance, and wisely refrained from making that very apparent; for the governor, who walked beside him, kept his eyes almost constantly fixed upon him, as if to prevent any communication even by a sign with the other prisoners.

On arriving at his chamber, the governor allowed him to pass in alone, and having fastened the door, returned to Lafemas, leaving De Blénau to meditate over his situation in solitude. The first pleasure of having escaped from immediate danger having subsided, there was nothing very cheering to contemplate in his position. His fate, though postponed, seemed inevitable. Richelieu, he knew, was no way scrupulous; and the only thing which honour could permit him to do, was to defend the queen's secret with his life.

The queen herself indeed might relieve him from his difficulty, if he could find any way of communicating with her. But in looking round for the means, absolute impossibility seemed to present itself on all sides. In vain he sought for expedients; his mind suggested none that a second thought confirmed. He once contemplated inducing the governor to forward a letter by the temptation of a large bribe; but a moment's reflection showed him that it was a thousand to one that the smooth-spoken officer both accepted his bribe and betrayed his trust.

Many other plans were rejected in a like manner, from a conviction of their impracticability, till at length a vague thought of gaining an interview with the woodman of Mantes, and, if possible, engaging him to bribe some of the inferior officers of the prison, crossed De Blénau's mind; and he was still endeavouring to regulate his ideas on the subject, when the bolts were once more withdrawn, and the governor again entered the apartment.

"Let me congratulate you, Monsieur de Blénau," said he, with a look of sincere pleasure, which probably sprang more from the prospect of continued gain to himself than any abstract gratification in De Blénau's safety. "Monsieur Lafemas is gone, and as the cardinal is at Chantilly, you will be safe for three or four days at least, as nothing can be decided till his eminence returns."

De Blénau well knew how to estimate the kindness of his friend the governor; but though he put its proper value upon it, and no more, he felt the necessity of striving to make his interested meanness act the part of real friendship.

"Well, Monsieur le Gouverneur," said he, assuming a cheerful air, "I suppose, then, that I shall remain with you a day or two longer; nor should I, indeed, care so much for the confinement, where I am so well treated, if I had some one to give me that attendance to which I have been accustomed."

"I do not know how that could be arranged," replied the governor, thoughtfully; "I would do any thing to serve you, Monsieur de Blènaux, consistent with my duty, but this is quite contrary to my orders; and if I were to allow you one of my own servants, it would put me completely in his power."

"Oh, that would not do at all," said De Blènaux; "but are there not some of the inferior prisoners—" The governor's brow darkened.—"Of course," continued the count, "you would have to pay them for their trouble—and I, of course, would reimburse you. If you think that three hundred crowns would induce one of them to wait on me for the time I am here, I would willingly pay the money into your hands, and you could make all the necessary arrangements for the purpose."

The countenance of the governor gradually cleared up as De Blènaux spoke, like a sheltered lake that, after having been agitated for a moment by some unwonted breeze, soon relapses into its calm tranquillity, when that which disturbed it has passed away. The idea of appropriating, with such unquestioned facility, the greater part of three hundred crowns, was the sun which thus speedily dispersed the clouds upon his brow; and he mused for a moment, calculating shrewdly the means of attaining his object.

"The worst of it is," said he at length, "that we have no inferior prisoners. They are all prisoners of state in the Bastille—But stay," he added, a felicitous idea crossing his mind,—"I remember there was a man brought here this morning by Chavigni's people, and they told me to give him all possible liberty, and employ him in the prison if I could."

"That will just do then," said De Blénau, inwardly praying that it might be the honest woodman of Mantes. "He can visit me here occasionally during the day, to see if I have need of him, and the guard at the door can take good care that I do not follow him out, which is all that your duty demands."

"Of course, of course," replied the governor; "it is your safe custody alone which I have to look to: and further, I am ordered to give you every convenience and attention, which warrants me in allowing you an attendant at least. - But here comes your dinner, sir."

"Dinner!" exclaimed De Blénau, "it surely is not yet noon." But so it proved: the time had passed more quickly than he thought: nor indeed had he any reason to regret the appearance of dinner, for the substantial and luxurious meal which was served up at his expense on that jour maigre did not prove any bad auxiliary in overcoming whatever scruple yet lingered about the mind of Monsieur le Gouverneur. At every mouthful of Becasse, his countenance became more placable and complacent, and while he was busily occupied in sopping the last morsels of his Dorade in the sauce au cornichons, and conveying them to the capacious aperture which stood open to receive them, our prisoner obtained his full consent that the person he had mentioned should have egress and regress of the apartment; for which liberty, however, De Blénau was obliged to pay down the sum of three hundred crowns under the specious name of wages to the attendant.

This arrangement, and the dinner, came to a conclusion much about the same time; and the governor, who had probably been engaged with De Blénau's good cheer much longer than was quite consistent with his other duties, rose and retired, to seek the inferior prisoner whose name he could not remember, but whom he piously resolved to reward with a crown per diem, thinking that such unparalleled liberality ought to be recorded in letters of gold.

In regard to De Blénau, the governor looked upon him as the bird with the golden eggs; but more prudent than the boy in the fable, he resolved to prolong his life to the utmost of his power, so long, at least, as he continued to produce that glittering ore which possessed such wonderful attraction in his eyes. But De Blénau was not so blind as he thought him; and though he waited with some impatience to see if the person on whom so much might depend, were or were not his honest friend the woodman, yet his thoughts were deeply engaged in revolving every means by which the cupidity of the governor might be turned to his own advantage.

At length the bolts were undrawn, and the prisoner, fixing his eyes upon the door, beheld a little old man enter with withered cheeks and sunken eyes; a greasy night-cap on his head, and a large knife suspended by the side of a long, thin sword, which sometimes trailed upon the ground, and sometimes, with reiterated blows upon the tendons of his meager shanks, seemed to reproach them for the bent and cringing posture in which they carried the woodcock-like body that surmounted them.

"Well, sir!" said De Blénau, not a little disappointed with the apparition; "are you the person whom the governor has appointed to wait upon me?"

"Oui, monsieur," said the little man, laying his hand upon his heart, with a profound inclination of his head, in which he contrived to get that organ completely out of sight, and, like a tortoise, to have nothing but his back visible. "Oui, monsieur; I am Cuisinier Vivandier, that is to say, formerly Vivandier; at present, Cuisinier Aubergiste ici à la porte de la Bastille, toute près. I have the honour to furnish the dinner for monseigneur, and I have come for the plates."

"Oh, is that all?" cried De Blénau: "take them, take them, my good friend, and begone."

The little man vowed that monseigneur did him too much honour; and gathering up his dishes with admirable dexterity, he held the heap with his left arm, reserving his right to lay upon his heart, in which position he addressed another profound bow to De Blénau, and left the apartment. The prisoner now waited some time, getting more and more impatient as the day wore on. At length, however, the door once more opened, and Philip the woodman himself appeared.

Between Philip and the young count there was, of course, much to be explained, which, requiring no explanation to the reader, shall not be here recapitulated. Every circumstance that Philip told, whether of his writing the letter to inform him of the plots of Chavigni and Lafemas, or of the manner and apparent reason of his being dragged from his cottage to the Bastille, concurred to give De Blénau greater confidence in his new ally; and, perhaps, Philip himself, from having suffered a good deal on De Blénau's account, felt but the greater inclination to hazard still more. Between two persons so inclined, preliminaries are soon adjusted; nor had De Blénau time to proceed with diplomatic caution, even had he had reason to suspect the sincerity of the woodman. The dangers of his situation admitted no finesse; and, overleaping all ceremonies, he at once demanded if Philip would and could convey a letter from him to the queen.

Of his willingness, the woodman said, there was no doubt; and after a moment's thought he added, that he had reason to hope that opportunity also would be afforded him. "It will be dangerous," said he, "but I think I can do it."

"Tell me how, good friend," demanded De Blénau; "and, depend upon it, whatever risks you run on my account, whether I live or die, you will be rewarded."

"I want no reward, sir," answered Philip, "but a good cause and a good conscience; and I am sure, if I serve you, I am as well engaged as if I were cutting all the fagots in Mantes. But my plan is this: they tell me that my children shall always be allowed to see me. Now I know my boy Charles, who is as active as a picvert, will not be long before he follows me. He will be here before nightfall, I am sure, and he shall take your letter to the queen."

De Blénau remained silent for a moment. "Was it your son who brought your letter to me?" demanded he. The woodman assented, and the count continued: "De was a shrewd boy then. At all events, it must be risked. Wait—I will write, and depend upon you.”

The woodman, however, urged that if he stayed so long, suspicion might be excited, and De Blè nau suffered him to depart, desiring him to return in an hour, when the letter would be ready. During his absence, the prisoner wrote that epistle which we have already seen delivered. In it he told his situation, and the nature of the questions which had been asked him by Lafemas. He hinted also that his fate was soon likely to be decided, and desired that any communication which it might be necessary to make to him, might be conveyed through the woodman of Mantes.

More than one hour elapsed after this letter was written before Philip again appeared. When he did so, however, he seemed in some haste. “Monsieur le Comte,” said he, “my son is here. They have let me take him into my cell to rest, but I dare not be absent more than a moment, for fear they suspect something. Is the letter ready?”

De Blè nau placed it in his hand, and would fain have added some gold. “The queen is at Chantilly,” said he, “and your son will want money for his journey.”

“No, no, sir,” replied Philip, “that is no stuff for a child. Let him have a broad piece, if you like, to help him on, but no more.”

“Well, then,” said the count, “accept the rest for your services. I have more in that valise.”

“Not so, either, monseigneur,” answered the woodman. “Pay for what is done, when it is done;” and taking the letter and one gold piece, he left the apartment.

CHAPTER XX.

THE heavy carriage which conveyed Pauline de Beaumont towards Paris rolled on with no great rapidity, and the time, to her anxious mind, seemed lengthened to an inconceivable degree. Towards night, every little town they entered she conceived to be the capital, and was not undeceived till Mademoiselle de Hauteford observed, that they had set out so late she was afraid they would be obliged to pass the night at Ecouen.

In her companion Pauline found but little to console or soothe her under the anxiety and fear which the dangerous enterprise she had undertaken naturally produced. Mademoiselle de Hauteford had little either of warmth of heart or gentleness of disposition; and such were the only qualities which could have assimilated with Pauline's feelings at that time.

In combating the passionate love with which the king had regarded her, Mademoiselle de Hauteford had entirely triumphed over her own heart, and having crushed every human sensation that it contained, she substituted a rigid principle of duty, which, like the mainspring of a piece of clockwork, originated all her actions, making them active without energy and correct without feeling.*

In the present instance, she seemed to look upon the task which Pauline had undertaken as a thing which ought to be done, and therefore that no doubt or hesitation of any kind could remain upon her mind. She talked calmly of all the difficulties and dangers which presented themselves, and of the best means of obviating them; but did not offer the least consolation to the fears of a young and inexperienced girl, who had taken upon herself a bold and perilous enterprise, in which her own happiness was at stake, as well as the lives and fortunes of others. The indifferent coolness with which she spoke of risks and obstacles was far from reassuring Pauline, who soon dropped the conversation, and, sinking into herself, revolved all the circumstances in her mind; her heart sometimes beating high with hope, sometimes sickening at the thought of failure.

* Madame de Motteville gives an account of this affair somewhat different in minute particulars from the above, and asserts that the queen, despairing herself of gaining her husband's affection, sought to increase his love for a person whom she knew to be devoted to herself. She says, "Dès que le roi la vit, il eut de l'inclination pour elle. La reine, à qui elle fut donnée d'abord pour fille d'honneur, la voyant naître dans l'ame de ce prince si farouche pour les dames, tacha de l'allumer," &c.

Thus in silence the travellers proceeded to Ecouen, where, from the lateness of the hour, they were obliged to pass the night; but leaving it early the next morning, they reached Paris in a short time, and alighted at the hotel of the Marchioness de Senecy. That lady, it appeared, was absent, having left Paris some time before, for a distant part of the country; but this was no disadvantage, as Mademoiselle de Hauteford was well known to the servants that remained in the house, and she did not in the least hesitate to take up her abode there on the service of the queen, though the mistress of the mansion herself was absent.

At Ecouen, Pauline had dressed herself in the clothes of her maid Louise, and on alighting at the hotel de Senecy, was taken by the servants for the soubrette of Mademoiselle de Hauteford. All this was to her wish; and, not a little delighted with the first success of her disguise, she affected the ton paysan, and treated the domestics with the same familiarity which they showed towards her.

An old and confidential servant of the queen was the only male attendant who accompanied them to Paris, and he took especial care not to undeceive the others in regard to Mademoiselle de Beaumont's rank, though he had more than once nearly betrayed the secret by smiling at the lady's-maid airs which Pauline contrived to assume. This task, however, was not of long duration; for Pauline's anxiety would not suffer her to remain inactive, and she accordingly pressed her companion to set out speedily for the Bastille, afraid that under any long delay, her courage, which she felt to be failing every moment, might give way entirely, and that she might at length prove unable to accomplish her undertaking.

Mademoiselle de Hauteford, whose acquaintance with the city qualified her to act as guide, readily agreed to proceed immediately on their expedition; and Pauline's disguise as soubrette not permitting her to make use of a mask like her companion, she covered her head as far as she could with a large capuchin of brown tafetas, which still was all insufficient to conceal her face. This being done, she followed the lady of honour into the street, and in a moment found herself immersed in all the bustle and confusion of the great, gay capital.

Poor Pauline's senses were almost bewildered by the crowd; but Mademoiselle de Hauteford, leaning on her arm, hurried her on as far as the Rue St. Antoine, where she stopped opposite to the church of St. Gervais, or rather the narrow dirty street which leads towards it.

Here she directed Pauline straight on to the Bastille, and pointing out the church, told her that she would wait there for her return, offering up prayers for the success of her enterprise.

The magnificent peristyle of the church of St. Gervais, which the celebrated De Brosse is said to have pronounced the most perfect of his works,—observing, like Solon on the Athenian laws, that it was not, indeed, the best that could be formed, but the best that could be adapted to the old Gothic building which he was directed to improve,—was then in the first gloss of its novelty, and amongst the many sombre smoky buildings that she had passed, offered to Pauline's eye a bright and conspicuous landmark, which she felt sure she could not mistake. She took, however, another glance, and then hurried on towards the Bastille.

Totally ignorant of Paris and all that it contained; young, beautiful, and timid; engaged in an undertaking full of danger and difficulty, and dressed in a manner to which she was unaccustomed; Pauline de Beaumont shrank from the glance of the numerous passengers that thronged the Rue St. Antoine; and every eye which, attracted by her loveliness, or by the frightened haste with which she proceeded, gazed on her with more than common attention, she fancied could see into her bosom, and read the secret she was so anxious to conceal.

At length her eye rested on a group of heavy towers, presenting nothing but massy stone walls, pierced with loopholes, and surmounted at various distances with embrasures, through the apertures of which the threatening mouths of some large cannon were occasionally visible. Sweeping round this gloomy building was a broad fosse filled with water, which prevented all approach but at one particular point, where a drawbridge, suspended by two immense chains, gave access to the outer court. But even here no small precaution was taken to guard against any one who came in other than friendly guise; for the gate which terminated the bridge on the inner side, besides the security afforded by its ponderous doors and barricadoes, possessed two flanking-towers, the artillery of which commanded the whole course of the approach.

Pauline had often heard the Bastille described, and its terrors detailed, by the guests who occasionally visited her mother's chateau in Languedoc; but, whatever idea she had formed of it, the frowning strength and gloomy horrors which the original presented, far outdid the picture her imagination had drawn; and so strong was the sensation of fear which it produced upon her mind, that she had nearly turned back and run away the moment she beheld it. An instant's reflection, however, re-awakened her courage.

"Claude de Blénau," she thought, "immured within those walls! and do I hesitate when his life, perhaps, depends upon my exertion?" That thought was enough to recall all her resolution; and rapidly crossing the drawbridge, she passed what is called the grille. But here her farther progress was stayed by a massy door covered with plates and studs of iron, which offered none of those happy contrivances either of modern or ancient days, by which people within are called upon to communicate with people without. There was no horn, as in the days of chivalry, and if there had been, Pauline could not have blown it; but, still worse, there was neither bell nor knocker; and the door, far from imitating the gates of Dis, in standing open night and day, seemed most determinately shut, although the comparison might have held in many other respects. With shaking knees and trembling hands, Pauline tried for some moments to gain admission, but in vain. The gate resisted all her weak efforts, her voice was scarcely audible, and vexed, wearied, and terrified, and not knowing what to do, she burst into a flood of tears.

At about a hundred yards on the other side of the fosse, forming one corner of the Rue St. Antoine, on the face of which it seemed a wart, or imposthume, stood a little narrow house of two stories high, the front of which displayed an immense board covered with a curious and remarkable device. This represented no other than the form of an immense wild boar, with a napkin tucked under his chin, seated at a table, on which smoked various savoury dishes, of which the above ferocious gentleman appeared to be partaking with a very wild-boarish appetite. Underneath all was written, in characters of such a size, that those who ran might read, Au Sanglier Gourmand, and then followed a further inscription, which went to state that Jacques Chatpilleur, autrefois Vivandier de l'Armée de Perpignan, à présent Aubergiste Traiteur, fed the hungry, and gave drink to those that thirsted, at all hours of the day and night.

Every one will allow that this man must have been blessed with a charitable disposition; and it so happened that, standing at his own door, with his heart opened by the benign influence of having cooked a dinner for the Count de Blénau, he beheld the ineffectual efforts of Pauline de Beaumont to gain admission into the Bastille.

The poor little man's heart was really moved; and skipping across the drawbridge, he was at her side in a moment. "What seek you, charmante demoiselle?" demanded the aubergiste, making her a low bow; and then observing her tears, he added, "Ma pauvre fille, do not weep. Do you wish to get in here?"

"Yes, indeed," replied Pauline; "but I cannot make them hear."

"There are many who want to get out, who cannot make them hear either," said the aubergiste; "but they shall hear me, at all events." So saying, he drew forth his knife, with a flourish which made Pauline start back, and applied the handle with such force to the gate of the prison, that the whole place echoed with the blows. Immediately, a little wicket was opened, and the head of a surly-looking porter presented itself at the aperture.

"Philip the woodman! Philip the woodman!" said he, as soon as he heard Pauline's inquiries. "Who is .

he, I wonder? We have nothing to do with woodmen here Oh, I remember the man. And we are to break through all rules and regulations for him, I suppose? But I can tell Monsieur Chavigni, or whoever gave the order, that I shall not turn the key for any one except at proper hours; so you cannot see him now, young woman—you cannot see him now."

"And is not this a proper hour?" asked Pauline. "I thought midday was the best time I could come."

"No," answered the porter, "I tell you no, my pretty demoiselle; this is the dinner-hour, so you must come again."

"When can I come then, sir?" demanded Pauline, "for I have journeyed a long way to see him."

"Why, then you are in need of rest," replied the other; "so you will be all the better for waiting till evening. Come about seven o'clock, and you shall see him."

"Cannot I see him before that?" asked the young lady, terrified at the delay.

"No! no! no!" roared the porter, and turning to shut the wicket; but bethinking him for a moment, he called after Mademoiselle de Beaumont—"Who shall I tell him wants him, when I see him?"

Pauline was unprepared with an answer, but the necessity of the moment made her reply, "His daughter;" trusting that, as there must be some understanding between him and De Blénau, the woodman would conceive her errand, and not betray any surprise, whether he had a daughter or not.

During this conversation, the aubergiste had remained hard by, really compassionating Pauline's disappointment.

"Ma pauvre fille," said he, as the wicket closed, "I am very sorry that they treat you so; but they are great brutes in these prisons. Bon Dieu! you look very pale. Come in with me here to my little place, and take some soup, and rest yourself till the time comes round."

Pauline thanked him for his offer, but declined it, of course; telling him that she was going to the house of a friend who waited for her ; and then taking leave of the good aubergiste, she left him interested in her sorrow, and enchanted by her sweet manner.

"La pauvrete!" said he, as he turned him home, "Elle a bien l'air d'une femme de qualite ça. Il y a quelque chose la dessous, ou je me trompe."

In the mean while, Pauline returned to the church of St. Gervais, where she found Mademoiselle de Hauteford still on her knees in the chapel of St. Denis.

Pauline's recital of what had happened called forth but few remarks from her companion, who only observed that seven would be an unpleasant hour, for that by that time night began to fall. To Mademoiselle de Beaumont, however, night seemed more favourable to her enterprise than day, when the trepidation which she felt was visible to every passing eye ; and she congratulated herself on the prospect of the darkness covering the agitation which might lead to suspicion if observed.

I shall not follow the two ladies through the remaining part of the day. Suffice it, that Mademoiselle de Hauteford employed herself in preparations for the long journey which the cardinal's sentence of banishment required her to take, and that Pauline's time passed in anxiety and apprehension, till the hour came for her once more to visit the Bastille.

As soon as the long hand upon the dial pointed towards the Roman capitals IX. and the shorter one to VII., the two ladies set out in the same guise, and on the same route, as in the morning, with only this difference in their proceedings, that the old domestic of the queen, who had accompanied them to Paris, received orders to follow at a few paces' distance, well armed with sword and pistol.

It was now quite dark, and the streets not being so crowded as when she before passed through them, Pauline proceeded more calmly, except when the torch-bearers of some of the gay world of Paris flashed their flambeaux in her eyes as they lighted their lords along to party or spectacle. At the church of St. Gervais she again left Mademoiselle de Hauteford with the servant ; and now, well acquainted with the way, ran lightly along till she arrived at the Bastille, where, not giving her resolution time to fail, she passed the drawbridge and the sentinels, and entered the outer gate, which was at that moment open. Before her stood the figure of the porter, enjoying the cool evening air that blew through the open gate into the court. His hand rested upon the edge of the door, and the moment Pauline entered, he pushed it to with a clang that made her heart sink.

"Whom have we here," said he, "that comes in so boldly? Oh, so! is it you, ma belle demoiselle?" he continued, as the light of the lanterns which hung under the arch fell upon her countenance:—"well, you shall see your father now. But first, I think, you had better go and speak to the governor; he is a man of taste, and would like such a pretty prisoner, no doubt; perhaps he might find a warrant for your detention."

Pauline's heart sank at the idea of being carried before the governor, well knowing how little competent she was to answer any inquiries concerning her errand; but the excess of fear will often give courage, and the most timid animals turn and resist when pressed to extremity. Thus Pauline summoned up all her resolution, and remembering the allusion which the porter had made to Chavigni's orders in favour of the woodman, she replied boldly. "This is no time for jesting, sir! and as for detaining me, it would be as much as the governor's post is worth, if it came to Monsieur de Chavigni's ears that he ever thought of such a thing."

"So, so!" cried the porter with a grin, "you are a friend of Monsieur de Chavigni's. So! I thought there was something made him so careful of yon sour old woodman. These great statesmen must have their little relaxations. So that is it, mademoiselle? He takes especial care of the father for the daughter's sake."

There was a drop or two of the warm blood of Languedoc flowing in Pauline's veins with all her gentleness, and her patience now became completely exhausted.

"Well, sir!" she answered, "all I have to say to you is, that if I meet with any insolence, it may cost you dear. So bring me to see my father, or refuse me at once."

"I am not going to refuse you, my pretty demoiselle," replied the porter; "though, truly, you speak more like a lady of quality than a woodman's daughter. Now I'll swear you are Madame la Comtesse's suivante. Nay, do not toss your head so impatiently; your father will be here in a minute; he knows of your having called at the wicket this morning, and is to come here to see you at seven.—But here is the governor, as I live—going to take a twilight walk, I suppose."

As he spoke, the governor approached. "Whom have you got here, porter?" he asked, while he eyed Pauline with one of those cool luxurious glances that made her shrink.

"This is the woodman's daughter, sir," replied the man, "who wishes to speak with her father."

"By the keys of St. Peter! which are something in my own way," exclaimed the governor, "thou art a beautiful daughter for a woodman. Art thou sure thy mother did not help thee to a better parentage? What is thy father's name?"

Terrified, confused, and ignorant of the woodman's name, Pauline faltered forth, unconscious of what she said, "I do not know."

"Ha! ha! ha! thou sayest well, my pretty damsel," cried the governor, laughing, and thinking that she answered his jest in kind. "It is a wise father that knows his child; and why not a wise child that knows his own father. But, without a joke, what is your supposed father's name?"

"My supposed father!" repeated Pauline, in the same state of perturbation: "Oh, Philip the woodman."

"Nay, nay," replied the governor, "that does not answer my meaning either. What is the surname of this Philip the woodman?"

The impossibility of answering overpowered her. Pauline had not the most remote idea of Philip's name, and another instant would indubitably have betrayed all; but at the moment the governor asked his question, Philip had entered the court. He had heard the last sentence, saw Pauline's embarrassment, and, divining its cause, with quick presence of mind caught her in his arms, and kissed her on both cheeks, with that sort of fatherly affection which would have deceived the governor's eyes by day, much less by the fainter light of the lanterns in the archway.

"My dear child!" cried he, "how art thou? and how is thy mother?" And then turning to the governor, without giving her time to reply, he went on, "My name, sir, which you were asking but now, is Philip Grissolles, but I am better known by the name of Philip the Woodman, and some folks add the name of the wood, and call me Philip the woodman of Mantes."

"Philip Grissolles!" said the governor; "very well, that will do. It was your surname that I wished to know, for it is not put down in the order for your detention, and it must be inserted in the books. And now, Monsieur Philip Grissolles, you may take your daughter to your cell; but, remember, that you have to wait on the Count de Blénau in half an hour, by which time I shall have returned. You can leave your daughter in your cell till you have done attending the count, if you like."

He then proceeded to the gate, and beckoning to the porter, he whispered to him, "Do not let her go out till I come back. It is seldom that we have any thing like that in the Bastille! Doubtless that woodman would be glad to have her with him; if so, we will find her a cell."

Philip turned his ear to catch what the governor was saying, but not being able to hear it distinctly, he addressed himself to Pauline loud enough to reach every one round. "Come," said he, "ma fille, you are frightened at all these towers, and walls, and places; but it is not so unpleasant after one is in it either. Take my arm, and I'll show you the way."

Pauline was glad to accept of his offer, for her steps faltered so much that she could hardly have proceeded without assistance; and thus, leaning on the woodman, she was slowly conducted through a great many narrow passages, to the small vaulted chamber in which he was lodged.

As soon as they had entered the woodman shut the door, and placing for Pauline's use the only chair that the room contained, he began to pour forth a thousand excuses for the liberty he had taken with her cheek. "I hope you will consider, mademoiselle, that there was no other way for me to act, in order to bring us out of the bad job we had fallen into. The porter of the prison told me this morning that my daughter was coming to see me, and knowing very well I had no daughter, I guessed that it was some one on the Count de Blénau's account; but little did I think that it was you, mademoiselle—you that I saw in the wood of Mantes on the day he was wounded."

Pauline was still too much agitated with all that had passed to make any reply, and sitting with her hands pressed over her eyes, her thoughts were all confusion, though one terrible remembrance still predominated, that she was there—in the very heart of the Bastille—far from all those on whom she was accustomed to rely—habited in a disguise foreign to her rank—acting an assumed character, and engaged in an enterprise of life and death.

All this was present to her, not so much as a thought, but as a feeling; and for a moment or two it deprived her not only of utterance, but of reflection. As her mind grew more calm, however, the great object for which she came began again to recover the ascendancy; and she gradually regained sufficient command over her ideas to comprehend the nature of the excuses which Philip was still offering for his presumption, as he termed it.

"You did perfectly right," replied Pauline; "and, having extricated us from a dangerous predicament, merit my sincere thanks. But now," she continued, "without loss of time, I must see the Count de Blénau."

"See the Count de Blénau!" exclaimed Philip in astonishment. "Impossible, mademoiselle! utterly impossible! I can deliver a letter or a message; but that is all I can do."

"Why not?" demanded Pauline. "For pity's sake, do not trifle with me. If you have free admission to his prison, why cannot you open the way to me?"

"Because, mademoiselle, there is a sentinel at his door who would not allow you to pass," replied Philip. "I have no wish to trifle with you, indeed; but what you ask is merely impossible."

Pauline thought for a moment. "Cannot we bribe the sentinel?" she demanded. "Here is gold."

"That is not to be done either," answered Philip. "He is not allowed to speak to any one, or any one to speak to him. The first word, his fusil would be at my breast; and the second, he would fire: such are his orders, mademoiselle, and be sure he would obey them."

"Well, then," cried Pauline, "fly to the Count de Blénau, tell him that there is a lady here from the queen, with a letter which she must not trust to any one else, and ask him what is to be done—but do not stay long, for I am afraid of remaining here by myself."

The woodman promised not to be a moment, and hastened to the Count de Blénau's apartment, where the wary sentinel, as usual, examined him well to ascertain his identity before he gave him admission. He then entered and communicated as rapidly as possible to De Blénau the message he had received.

"It is Mademoiselle de Hauteford, without doubt," said De Blénau thoughtfully; "I must see her by all means."

"See her, sir!" exclaimed Philip. "The guard will never let her pass. It is quite impossible."

"Not so impossible as you think. The gates of the inner court do not shut, I think, till nearly nine.—Is there any one in the court?"

"No one, sir," answered the woodman; "all the state prisoners were locked up at six."

"Well, then, Philip," proceeded De Blénau, "do you know a small tower in the court where you just see through the archway part of an old flight of steps?"

"Oh yes, I know it well," replied Philip. "The tower is never used now, they tell me. There is a heap of rubbish in the doorway."

"Exactly," said the count. "Now, my good Philip, bring the lady with all speed to that tower, and up the old flight of steps till you come to a small iron door: push that with your hand, and you will find that it brings you into the inner room, where I will wait for you.

Philip's joy and astonishment found vent in three Bon Dieus! and three Est-il possibles; and rushing away without more loss of time, he flew to Pauline, whose stay in his cell had been undisturbed by any thing but her own anxious fears. These, however, magnified every sound into the approach of some one to be dreaded. Even the footstep of the woodman made her heart beat with alarm; but the news he brought far more than compensated for it; and, inspired with new hope, she followed him gladly through the gloomy passages which led to the inner court.

The darkness which pervaded the unlighted avenues of the Bastille was so great, that Pauline was obliged to tread close upon Philip's footsteps for fear of losing her way. The woodman, however, was a little in advance, when a faint light showed that they were approaching the open air, and Pauline began to catch an indistinct glimpse of the dark towers that surrounded the inner court. But at that moment Philip drew back:—"There is some one in the court," he whispered: "Hark!"—and listening, she clearly heard the sound of measured steps crossing the open space before her.

"It is the guard," said the woodman, in the same low voice; "they are going to relieve the sentinel at the count's door." He now waited till they were heard ascending the stairs, and then, "Quick, follow me across the court, mademoiselle," he said; "for they go through this passage on their return."

Pauline was about to follow him as he desired, but her dress caught upon one of the staples of the doorway. Philip attempted to disentangle it for her, but in vain, his efforts only fixed it the more. Pauline herself tried to tear it away, but the soubrette's stout serge-dress would not tear. In the mean time they heard the "Qui vive?" of the sentinel, the countersign returned, the relief of the guard; and by the time that Philip had by main strength torn away the dress from the staple that had caught it, the steps of the soldiers were again heard descending the staircase from the prison of De Blénau.

"For God's sake, mademoiselle," whispered the woodman, "run back as quickly as you can to my cell, for we cannot pass now without their seeing us. I will wait here, for they would hear my heavy feet in the passage, and follow us both; but if I can stop them the while, I will, to give you time."

Pauline doubted not that she could remember the turnings, and, gliding along as fast as possible, she endeavoured to find her way back. As she went, she heard some words pass between Philip and the guard; and immediately after, she distinguished that they had entered the passage; for the echoing tramp of their feet, reverberated by the low arches, seemed following close upon her. Terrified and agitated, she flew on with the speed of lightning. But we all know how difficult it is to retrace any course we have pursued in the dark; and in her haste and confusion, Pauline lost the turning she ought to have taken, and, afraid of going back, even after she discovered her mistake, she paused for a moment in a state of alarm and suspense, little short of agony.

She could now distinctly hear the guard approaching, and not knowing where the passage might terminate, or what might obstruct the path, she felt her way with her hand along the wall, till at length she discovered a small recess, apparently one of those archways which gave entrance to the various cells; for beneath her fingers she felt the massy bolts and fastenings which secured it from without. She had scarce a moment to think, but placing herself under the arch, she drew back as far as possible, in the hope that, sheltered by the recess, and concealed by the darkness, the guard would pass her by unnoticed.

It was a dreadful moment for poor Pauline. The soldiers were not so near as the echoes of the place had led her to imagine; and she had several minutes to wait, holding her breath, and drawing herself in, as if to nothing, while the tramp of the armed feet came nearer and nearer, till at length she felt, or fancied that she felt, their clothes brush against her as they passed ; and then heard their steps becoming fainter and more faint as they proceeded to some other part of the building.

It was not till all was again silent that Pauline ventured, still trembling with the danger she had just escaped, to seek once more the path she had lost in her terror. But her search was now in vain ; she had entirely forgot the turnings that she had taken in her flight, and, in the darkness, only went wandering on from one passage to another, starting at every sound, and always convinced that she was mistaken, but not knowing in what direction to seek the right.

At length she found herself at a gateway which led into what seemed an open court, and imagining from the towers she saw round about, that she had arrived once more at the spot from which she had been frightened by the approach of the guards, she resolved again to seek more cautiously the cell of the woodman, to which, of course, he would return in search of her. But, as she turned to put this resolve in execution, she perceived a light coming down the passage towards her ; and without giving herself a moment to reflect that it might possibly be the woodman himself, fear seized her again, and, darting across the court, she looked round for some place of concealment.

Exactly opposite, she perceived another archway similar to the one she had left, and concealing herself within it, she paused to see who it was that followed ; it just occurring to her mind at that instant, that perhaps she was in full career away from the very person she wished to find. But, the moment after, the light appeared in the archway, and glancing on the face of the man who carried it, discovered to her the features of the governor.

This sight was not calculated to allay her fears ; but her alarm was infinitely increased when she perceived that he began crossing the court towards the spot where she stood. Flight again became her resource, and turning to escape through the passages to which she supposed that archway led, as well as the others, she struck her foot against some steps, and had nearly fallen. Recovering herself, however, without loss of time she began ascending the steps that lay before her, nor stopped till, reaching a small landing-place, she looked through one of the loopholes in the wall, and beheld the governor directing his course to another part of the building.

Satisfied that he did not follow her, but faint and out of breath with the speed she had employed in her flight, Pauline paused for a moment's repose; and stretching out her hand, she leaned against a door which stood at the top of the staircase.—However, it afforded her no support, for the moment she touched it, it gave way under her hand, and flying open, discovered to her a well-lighted apartment. New terror seized upon Pauline; her eyes were dazzled by the sudden glare, and drawing back, she would have fallen headlong down the stairs, but at that instant she was caught in the arms of De Blénau.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE tumult of joy and surprise—the mutual explanations—the delight of De Blénau—the relief to Pauline—with the thousand little et-cetera of such a meeting, I must leave to the reader's imagination, which will doubtless do much more justice to every circumstance than could the quill of a foolish bird such as I hold in my hand. Neither shall I dilate upon the surprise of Philip the woodman, when, on coming to inform De Blénau that he had lost the lady in the windings of the Bastille, he discovered that she had found her way to the object of her search without his sage guidance. One piece of information, however, he conveyed, which hurried their conference towards a conclusion. The governor, he said, who had been absent, had returned, and was then engaged in visiting the western wards; and therefore he might be shortly expected in that part of the prison.

This unpalatable news reminded Pauline to deliver the letter from the queen, which in the joy and agitation of their first meeting she had neglected to do. De Blénau looked it over with a hurried glance. "She commands me," said he, "to confess all exactly as it occurred; but on one or two points I have already refused to answer, and if I do so now without producing the queen's warrant for my conduct, I shall be held a base coward, who betrays his trust for fear of the torture."

"And do you hesitate, Claude?" demanded Pauline, rather reproachfully—"do you hesitate to take the only means which can save you? Do you think nothing of what I feel? You, Claude, may be proof against corporeal torture; but I can not endure much longer the mental agony I have suffered since you have been confined here, especially when I reflected that even while you were acting most nobly, I was suspecting you ungenerously. If you love me as you profess, dear Claude, you will take the means that the queen directs to ensure your safety."

"Well, dearest Pauline," replied De Blénau, yielding to the all-persuasive eloquence of woman's lips, "I will do as you wish, and endeavour to pursue such measures as will be safe and honourable. But now conclude what you were telling me, of having lost yourself in the prison, and how you found your way hither."

It may be necessary to explain, that while this conversation had taken place between De Blénau and Pauline in the inner apartment, Philip the woodman had remained in the outer chamber, keeping watch with his ear to the door which communicated with the staircase, in order to apprize them in time of the governor's approach. Pauline now had not time to conclude her little history of perilous escapes and dangers ere Philip, entering from the outer chamber, interrupted her: "Fly down the stairs, mademoiselle," cried he, "and wait at the bottom till I join you. The governor is coming, for I hear other steps on the stairs as well as those of the sentinel at the top."

Prisons are not places for great ceremonies, nor for all the mighty delicacies of general society; so Pauline suffered De Blénau to press his lips upon hers unreprieved, and then fled down the back staircase with the speed of light; after which the count shut and bolted the iron door and passed into the outer chamber, while the woodman bustled about in the inner one, arranging the count's apparel for the night, and appearing much more busy than he really was.

Thus every thing was as it should be when the governor entered; but still there was an angry spot upon his brow, and with but a slight inclination to De Blénau, he looked through the door between the two chambers, saying, "Well, Mr. Woodman of Mantes, where is your daughter? She is not in your cell."

"You have made sure of that in person, I suppose," replied Philip, in his usual surly manner.

"Whether I have or not," answered the governor "does but little signify. I ask, where is your daughter? We must have no strangers wandering about the Bastille."

"I know my child's beauty as well as you do, monsieur," replied Philip, "and was too wise to leave her in my cell, where every one that chose would have liberty and time to affront her, while I was attending upon Monsieur le Comte here: so I made her come with me, and set her under the archway of the old tower to wait till I was done. Now, if monsieur has done with me, I will go and conduct her to the outer gate, and never with my will shall she set her foot within these walls again."

"I have no further need of you to-night, Philip," said De Blénau, as the woodman stood at the door ready to depart; and then, seeing that the governor turned to follow him out, he added, "Monsieur le Gouverneur, will you sup with me this evening?"

Philip quitted the room, but the governor was obliged to stay to reply. "With pleasure, sir, with pleasure," said he. "I will be back with you immediately, before my servant brings the plates; but I must first take the liberty of seeing this demoiselle out of the prison-gates." He then left De Blénau, and having bolted the door, followed the woodman quickly down the steps. Still Philip had gained so much upon him, that he had time to whisper to Pauline, whom he found waiting in the archway;

"The governor is coming, but do not be alarmed. Let him think that I bade you wait for me here till I had attended the count."

Pauline, however, could not help being alarmed. While the excitement of her enterprise had continued, it afforded a false sort of courage, which carried her through; but now that her object was gained, all her native timidity returned, and she thought of encountering the governor again with fear and trembling. Nor had she much time to recall her spirits before he himself joined them.

"Well, my fair demoiselle," he cried, "I think if I had known that you were waiting here all alone in the dark, I should have paid you a visit;" and he raised the lamp close to Pauline's face, which was as pale as death. "Why, you look as terrified," proceeded the governor, "as if you had been committing murder. Well, I will light you out, and when you come to-morrow, you will not be so frightened. At what hour do you come, eh?"

"I desire that you would not come at all," said Philip aloud, as he followed the governor, who was escorting Pauline along with an air of gallantry and badinage which did not at all set off his thin, demure features to advantage, especially in the unbecoming light of the lamp that flickered upon them but at intervals, tipping all the acute angles of his countenance with not the most agreeable hue. "I desire that you would not come at all: you have been here once too often already. Let your brother Charles come the next time."

The governor darted a glance at Philip, which certainly evinced that his face could take on, when it liked, an expression of hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness; and in a minute or two after, by some means, the lamp went out in his hands. "Here, Philip," cried he, "take the lamp, and get a light."

"Your pardon, sir," answered the sturdy woodman; "not till I have seen my daughter beyond the gates."

"Philip Grissolles, or Philip the woodman, or whatever you call yourself," cried the governor, "are you mad? Do you know what you are about? Go and fetch me a light instantly, or refuse me at your peril!"

"I do refuse, then," replied the woodman, who had learned by conversation with the porter and turnkeys, how much power the governor had placed in his hands by permitting him to attend upon the Count de Blè nau; "I am your prisoner, sir," he continued, "but not your servant."

"I have allowed you to act as such in the prison," said the governor, "and there are no servants here but mine."

"In suffering me to attend upon the Count de Blè nau," rejoined Philip boldly, "you have outstepped your duty, and broken the express order of the cardinal. So much have I learned since I came here—therefore allow my daughter to depart quietly, sir. We shall find a light in the porter's room."

"By heavens! I have a mind to detain the girl all night, for your insolence," cried the governor, stamping with rage.

"Oh, for God's sake do not!" exclaimed Pauline, clasping her hands; but Philip came close up to him: "You dare not," said he, in a low voice; "for your head, you dare not!" And then added aloud to Pauline, "Come along, my child; Monsieur le Gouverneur will let you out."

During this altercation, they had continued to proceed; and the governor, knowing that his violation of the cardinal's commands with regard to the strict confinement of De Blè nau, might bring his head to the block if sifted thoroughly, thought it best to abstain from irritating a person who not only possessed, but knew that he possessed so much power. Not that he would not willingly have silenced the woodman by some of those infallible means which were much resorted to in that day; but that he knew Chavigni was not easily satisfied on such points; and thus, being in a situation which is popularly expressed by "the horns of a dilemma," like a good Christian as he was, he chose rather to risk discovery than commit a murder which would undoubtedly be found out. Under these circumstances, he permitted Philip and Pauline to proceed to the gates, and ordered the porter to give the young lady egress; taking care, however, to follow them all the way till they arrived at the last gate opening upon the drawbridge, which, at the time they arrived, had not been yet raised for the evening.

Pauline's heart beat with glad impatience as the janitor put his key into the lock, whose bolt grating harshly as it was withdrawn, produced to her ears most excellent music.

It so unfortunately happened, however, that at the moment the gate swung heavily back upon its hinges, Charles, the woodman's son, presented himself for admission; and having before had free access to his father, was proceeding calmly through the open door, without taking any notice of Mademoiselle de Beaumont, whom he did not recognise in her disguise.

"What!" exclaimed the governor, whose Bastille habits rendered him quick to the slightest suspicion, "do you not speak to your sister?"

"Sister!" said the boy, confounded; "I have no sister!"

Pauline saw that in another moment all would be lost; and darting past the governor, she was through the gate, and over the drawbridge in a moment.

"Nom de Dieu!" cried the governor: "Follow her, Letrames!—quick, quick!"

The turnkey was on Pauline's footsteps in a minute; but she had gained so much in the first instance, that she would certainly have escaped with ease, if an envious stone had not obstructed her path at the bottom of the glacis, and striking her foot, occasioned her to fall. Pauline uttered a scream of both pain and fear; and two steps would have brought the turnkey to the spot where she lay, when suddenly a small, strange-shaped figure in white, skipped over her prostrate form, and interposed between her and her pursuer.

"Ventre Saint Gris!" cried the redoubtable Jaques Chatpilleur, cuisinier aubergiste, who thus came to her assistance—"You shall not touch her!" and drawing the long rapier that hung beside his carving-knife, he made a pass so near the breast of the turnkey, that the official started back full ten paces, not knowing, in the dim light of the hour, what hobgoblin shape thus crossed his purpose. "Maraud!" continued the aubergiste. "Who are you that dare to injure this demoiselle? under the very walls of the Bastille, too, contrary to the peace and quiet of his majesty's true subjects! Get thee gone, or I will spit thee like a chapon de maine, or, rather, skewer thee like an ortolan under the wings!"

This professional allusion, together with a moment's reflection, enabled Letrames, the turnkey, to call to mind the ancien vivandier; and showering upon him a thousand harsh epithets for his interference, he called upon him to stand aside, and let him secure his prisoner; still, however, standing aloof from the point of the weapon,—for Jaques Chatpilleur, while vivandier to the army, had shown that he could gather laurels with his sword, as well as with his knife; and had as often, to use Sancho's expression, given his enemies a belly-full of dry blows, as he had filled his friends with more dainty fare; but with this difference, that the drubbings he bestowed gratis.

In the present instance, he either did not or would not know the turnkey; and continued vociferating to him to hold off, and tell him who he was, with such reiteration, that for some time the other had no opportunity of replying. At length he roared, rather than said, "Jaques Diable! you know me well enough; I am Letrames Géolier au château."

The aubergiste looked over his shoulder, and seeing that Pauline was no longer visible, he very quietly put up his rapier, saying, "Mais mon Dieu! mon ami, why did you not tell me that before? Je vous en demande mille pardons;" and seizing the turnkey in his arms, he embraced him, making a thousand excuses for having mistaken him, and hugging him with a sort of malicious affection, which quite put a stop to his pursuit of Pauline.

The only benediction that the gaoler thought proper to bestow on the little aubergiste was a thousand curses, struggling all the time to free himself from the serpent folds of Chatpilleur's embrace. But it was not till the aubergiste had completely satisfied himself, that he suffered Letrames to escape, and the very composedly offered to assist him in the pursuit, which he well knew would now be ineffectual.

The darkness of the night had prevented this scene from being visible from the gates of the Bastille. and Letrames, on his return to the prison, was too wise to complain of the conduct of our friend Chatpilleur; a vivandier at the gates of the Bastille being much too convenient an acquaintance to be quarrelled with upon trifles.

During his absence, the wrath of the governor turned upon Philip the woodman. "What is the meaning of this? Villain!" exclaimed he, "this is none of your daughter! Fouchard! La Heuterie!" he called aloud to some of his satellites—"quick! bring me a set of irons! we shall soon hear who this is, Monsieur Philip Grissolles!"

"You will never hear any thing from me more than you know already," replied Philip; "so put what irons on me you like." But you had better beware, Sir Governor; those that meddle with pitch will stick their fingers. You do not know what you may bring upon your head."

"Silence, fool!" cried the governor in a voice that made the archway ring; "you know not what you have brought upon your own head.—Fouchard! La Heuterie! I say, why are you so long? Oh, here you come at last. Now secure that fellow, and down with him to one of the dark dungeons!—Porter, turn that young viper out," he continued, pointing to Charles, who stood trembling and weeping by his father's side; "turn him out, I say!—we will have no more of these traitors than we have occasion for."

At the words dark dungeon, Philip's courage had almost failed him, and it was not without an effort that he kept his sturdy limbs from betraying his emotion, while the gaolers began to place the irons on his wrists and ankles: but when he heard the order to drive forth his son, he made a strong effort, and caught the boy in his arms. "God bless you, Charles! God bless you, my boy! and fear not for me," he exclaimed, "while there is a power above."

It was a momentary solace to embrace his child, but the porter soon tore the boy from his arms, and pushing him through the gate, closed it after him, rejoicing that he should no more have to turn the key for any of the woodman's family. "Now," said he, "now we shall have no more trouble; I hate to see all our good old rules and regulations broken through. I dare say if his eminence the cardinal—God protect him!—were to follow this Monsieur Chavigni's advice, we should have every thing out of order; and all the good store of chains and irons here in the lodge would get rusty for want of use."

"Peace, peace!" cried the governor: "La Heuterie, take that fellow down, as I told you. He shall have the question to-morrow, and we shall see if he finds that so easy to bear. Away with him, quick!—A fool I was to be so deceived!—I suspected something when she stammered so about her father's name." So saying, he turned to hear the report of Letrames, who at that moment returned from his unsuccessful pursuit of Pauline.

In the mean while, the gaolers led Philip, who moved with difficulty in his heavy irons, across the first and second court, and opening a low door in the western tower, displayed to his sight a flight of steps leading down to the lower dungeons. At this spot La Heuterie, who seemed superior in rank to his fellow-turnkey, lighted a torch that he had brought with him at his companion's lantern, and descending to the bottom of the steps, held it up on high to let Philip see his way down. The woodman shuddered as he gazed at the deep, gloomy chasm which lay before him, but half seen in the glare of the torch, the light of which glancing upon the wall in different places, showed its green, damp, and ropy slime, without offering any definite limit to the dark and fearful vacuity. But he had no time to make any particular remark, for the second gaoler, who stood at his side, rudely forced him on; and descending the slippery stone steps, he found himself in a large long vault, paved with round stones, and filled with heavy subterranean air, which at first made the torch burn dim, and took away the woodman's breath. As the light, however, spread slowly through the thick darkness, he could perceive three doors on either hand, which he conceived to give entrance to some of those underground dungeons, whose intrinsic horror, as well as the fearful uses to which they were often applied, had given a terrific fame to the name of the Bastille, and rendered it more dreaded than any other prison in France.

During this time they had paused a moment, moving the torch slowly about, as if afraid that it would be extinguished by the damp; but when the flame began to rise again, La Heuterie desired his companion to bring the prisoner to number six, and proceeding to the extremity of the vault, they opened the farthest door on the left, which led into a low damp cell, cold, narrow, and unfurnished, the very abode of horror and despair. Into this they pushed the unfortunate woodman, following themselves, to see, as they said, if there was any straw.

"Have you brought some oil with you?" demanded La Heuterie, examining a rusty iron lamp that hung against the wall: "This is quite out."

"No, indeed," replied Fouchard, "and we cannot get any to-night; but he does not want it till day. It is time for him to go to sleep."

"No, no," rejoined the other, who seemed at least to have some human feeling; "do not leave the poor devil without light. Give him your lantern, man; you can fetch it to-morrow, when you come round to trim the lamps."

The man grumbled, but did as La Heuterie bade him; and having fastened the lantern on the hook where the lamp hung, they went away, leaving Philip to meditate over his fate in solitude.

"I have brought it on myself at last," thought the woodman, as, looking round him, he found all the horrors he had dreamed of the Bastille more than realized; and his spirit sank within him. Cut off from all communication with any human being, he had now no means of making his situation known; and the horrible idea of the torture shook all his resolution and unmanned his heart.

It would hardly be fair to pursue the course of his reflections any further; for if, when he remembered his happy cottage in the wood of Mantes, and his wife and his little ones, a momentary thought of disclosing all he knew crossed the woodman's mind, the next instant, the ruin of the queen, the death of the good Count de Blenau and a train of endless ills and horrors to those who confided in him, flashed across his imagination; and nerved his heart to better things. He called to mind every generous principle of his nature; and, though but a humble peasant, he struggled nobly against the dishonouring power of fear.

Sleep, however, was out of the question; and he sat mournfully on the straw that had been placed for his bed, watching the light in the lantern, as inch by inch it burned away, till at last it gleamed for a moment in the socket—sank—rose again with a bright flash, and then became totally extinguished. He now remained in utter darkness, and a thousand vague and horrible fancies crowded upon his imagination while he sat there, calculating how near it was to day, when he fancied that even the momentary presence of the gaoler would prove some relief to the blank solitude of his situation. Hour after hour, however, passed away, and no glimpse of light told him it was morning. At length the door opened and the gaoler appeared, bringing with him a fresh lighted lamp; thus offering a frightful confirmation of Philip's fears, that the beams of the sun never penetrated to the place of his confinement.

The gaoler took down the lantern, and having fastened the lamp in its place, gave to the unfortunate woodman a loaf of bread and a pitcher of water. "Come!" exclaimed Fouchard, in a tone which spoke no great pleasure in the task; "get up; I am to take off your irons for you; and truly there is no great use of them, for, with the wit of a serpent and the strength of a lion, you could not get out here."

"I suppose so," answered Philip. "But I trust that it will not be long before I am released altogether."

"Why, I should guess that it would not," answered the gaoler, in somewhat of a sarcastic tone, still continuing to unlock the irons; "people do not in general stay here very long."

"How so?" demanded Philip anxiously, misdoubting the tone in which the other spoke.

“Why,” replied he, “you must know there are three ways, by one of which prisoners are generally released, as you say, altogether; and one way is as common as another, so far as my experience goes. Sometimes they die under the torture; at other times they are turned out to have their head struck off; or else they die of the damp: which last we call being home sick.” And with this very consolatory speech, he bundled up the irons under his arm, and quitted the cell, taking care to fasten the door behind him.

CHAPTER XXII.

HAVING now left the woodman as unhappy as we could wish, and De Blénau very little better off than he was before, we must proceed with Pauline, and see what we can do for her in the same way.

It has been already said that, in the hurry of her flight, she struck her foot against a stone and fell. This is an unpleasant accident at all times, and more especially when one is running away; but Pauline suffered it not to interrupt her flight one moment longer than was necessary. Finding that some unexpected obstacle had delayed her pursuer as well as herself, she was upon her feet in a moment; and leaving him to arrange his difference with Monsieur Chatpilleur in the best way he could, she flew on towards the Rue St. Antoine, without stopping to thank her deliverer; and, indeed, without knowing that the good aubergiste, taking a sincere interest in her fate, had, at the hour appointed, waited at the door of his auberge till he saw her enter the Bastille, and then, from some undefined feeling that all would not go right, had watched anxiously to see her safe out again.

The interest not being reciprocal, Pauline had forgot all about the aubergiste; and only seeing that some one obstructed her pursuer, she fled, as I have said before, to the Rue St. Antoine. She passed Jacques Chatpilleur's little auberge, without any exchange of sentiment, even with the Sanglier Gourmand, and darted by the boutique of a passementier with the same celerity. The next shop was a marchand de broderie et de dentelle, with a little passage, or cul de sac, between it and the following house, which was occupied by a brocanteur; both which trades requiring daylight in aid of their operations, were at that hour firmly closed with bolt and bar, nor shed one solitary ray to light the passenger along the streets.

Just as she had come opposite to the first of these, Pauline found some one seize her robe behind, and the next minute a large Spanish cloak was thrown over her head, while a gigantic pair of arms embracing her waist, raised her from the ground, and bore her along the street. Naturally conceiving that she was in the power of some of her pursuers from the Bastille, Pauline did not perceive, in the dreadful agitation of the moment, that she was carried in a different direction; and giving herself up for lost, she yielded to her fate without scream or cry. Whoever it was that held her, carried her like a feather; but after striding along through several turnings, he paused, placed her on the ground, and still holding the cloak over her head with one hand, seemed to open a door with the other. The next moment he raised her again, though in a different position, and carried her up what was evidently a small winding staircase, at the top of which he again opened a door, where, even through the cloak, Pauline could perceive that they had entered some place which contained a powerful light. The moment the door was open, some one exclaimed, "It is she! Oh, Jesu! yes, it is she!" in a voice which sounded so like that of her maid Louise, that Pauline was more than ever bewildered. The person who had carried her now placed her in a chair, and taking the additional security of tying the cloak over her head, communicated for a few minutes with the other person in whispers; after which Pauline fancied that some one quitted the room. The covering was then removed from her eyes, and she found herself in a small, meanly-furnished apartment, whose only occupant, besides herself, was a handsome man, of very gigantic proportions, and of that sort of daring aspect which smacked a little of the bravo. He was well dressed in a pourpoint of green lustring, braided with gold lace, slightly tarnished; the haut-de-chausses was of the same, tied down the side with red ribbons; and the cloak which he removed from Pauline's head seemed to form part of the dress, though he had deprived himself of it for the moment, to answer the purpose in which we have seen it employed. On the whole, he was a good-looking cavalier, though there was a certain air of lawlessness in his countenance and mien which made Pauline shrink.

"Nay, do not be afraid, mademoiselle," said he, with a strong Norman accent: "Point de danger, point de danger!" and he strove to reassure her to the best of his power. He possessed no great eloquence, however, at least of the kind calculated to calm a lady's fears; and the only thing which tended to give Pauline any relief, was the manifest respect with which he addressed her, standing cap in hand, and reiterating that no harm was intended or could happen to her.

She listened without attending, too much frightened to believe his words to their full extent, and striving to gain from the objects round about some more precise knowledge of her situation. She was evidently not in the Bastille; for the door of the room, instead of offering to her view bolts and bars, of such complicated forms, that, like the mousetrap, they would have puzzled the man that made them, was only fastened by a single wooden lock, the key of which, like a dog's tongue in a hot day, kept lolling out with a negligent inclination towards the ground, very much at ease in its key-hole. The more Pauline gazed around her, the more she was bewildered; and after resolving twenty times to speak to the Norman, and as often failing in courage, she at last produced an articulate sound which went to inquire where she was. The Norman, who had been walking up and down the room, as if waiting the arrival of some one, stopped in the midst, and making a low inclination, begged to assure mademoiselle that she was in a place of safety.

The ice being broken, Pauline demanded, "Did not I hear the voice of my maid Louise?"

"No; it was my wife, mademoiselle," replied her companion drily; and recommencing his perambulations, the young lady sank back into herself. At length a tap was heard at the door, and the Norman starting forward went on the outside, closing it after him, though not completely; and of the conversation which ensued between him and some other man, Pauline could catch detached sentences, which, though they served but little to elucidate her position to herself, may be of service to the reader.

At first all was conducted in a whisper, but the Norman soon broke forth—"Sachristie! I tell you she got in. I did not catch her till she was coming out."

"Monseigneur will be precious angry with us both," answered the other. "How I missed you, I cannot imagine; I only went to call upon la petite Jeanette, and did not stay five minutes."

"And I just stepped into the Sanglier Gourmand," rejoined our Norman, "which is opposite, you know. There I thought I could see all that went on. But that maraud, Jacques Chatpilleur, was always at his door about something; so finding that I could not get my second bottle of wine, I went down to the cave for it myself; and she must have passed while I was below."

"How did you find out, then, that she had got into the Bastille?" demanded the other.

The Norman's reply was delivered in so low a tone that Pauline could not distinguish the words.—"Heard a scream—saw her running past like mad—threw the cloak over her, and brought her here."

"Perhaps she was not in, after all," rejoined the other; "but, at all events, we must tell monseigneur so. You swear you caught her just as she was going in, and I'll vow that I was there and saw you."

A new consultation seemed to take place; but the speakers proceeded so rapidly, that Pauline could not comprehend upon what it turned exactly, although she was herself evidently the subject of discussion. "Oh, she will not tell, for her own sake," said one of the voices. "She would be banished, to a certainty, if it was known that she got in; and as to the folks at the Bastille, be sure that they will hold their tongues."

Something was now said about a letter, and the voice of the Norman replied, "Monseigneur does not suppose that she had a letter. Oh, no! trust me, she had none. It was word of mouth work, be you sure. They were too cunning to send a letter which might be stopped upon her. No, no! they know something more than that."

"Well, then, the sooner we take her there, the better," rejoined the other; "the carriage is below, but you must blind her eyes, for she may know the liveries."

"Ah! your cursed livery betrayed us once before," answered the Norman. "Holla! la haut! mon Ange, give me a kerchief; I will tie her eyes with that, for the cloak almost smothers her, poor little soul!"

A light step was now heard coming down stairs, and a third person was added to the party without. What they said, Pauline could not make out; but though speaking in a whisper, she was still confident that she distinguished the voice of her maid Louise. "Harm!" said the Norman, after a moment, "we are going to do her no harm, chère amie! She will be down there in Maine with the countess, and as happy as a princess. Give this gentleman the trunk-mail, and get yourself ready against I come back, for we have our journey to take too, you know, ma petite femme."

The Norman now laid his hand upon the lock; there was a momentary bustle as of the party separating; and then entering the room, he informed Pauline that she must allow him to blindfold her eyes. Knowing that resistance was in vain, Pauline submitted with a good grace; and, her fears considerably allayed by the conversation she had overheard, attempted to draw from the Norman some further information. But here he was inflexible; and having tied the handkerchief over her eyes, so as completely to prevent her seeing, he conducted her gently down the stairs, taking care to keep her from falling; and having arrived in the open air, lifted her lightly into a carriage, placed himself by her side, and gave orders to drive on.

The vehicle had not proceeded many minutes, when it again stopped; and Pauline was lifted out, conducted up a flight of stone steps, and then led into an apartment, where she was placed in a fauteuil, the luxurious softness of which bespoke a very different sort of furniture from that of the chamber which she had just left. There was now a little bustle, and a good deal of whispering, and then every one seemed to leave the room. Fancying herself alone, Pauline raised her hand, in order to remove the handkerchief from her eyes, at least for a moment; but a loud "Prenez garde!" from the Norman stopped her in her purpose, and the next instant a door opened, and she heard steps approaching.

"Shut the door," said a voice she had never heard before. "Marteville, you have done well. Are you sure that she had no conversation with any one within the prison?"

"I will swear to it!" answered the Norman, with the stout asseveration of a determined liar. "Ask your man Chauvelin, monseigneur; he was by, and saw me catch hold of her before she was at the gate."

"So he says," rejoined the other; "but now leave the room. I must have some conversation with this demoiselle myself. Wait for me without."

"Pardie!" muttered the Norman, as he withdrew; "he'll find it out now, and then I'm ruined."

"Mademoiselle de Beaumont," said the person that remained, "you have been engaged in a rash and dangerous enterprise.—Had you succeeded in it, the Bastille must have been your doom, and severe judgment according to the law. By timely information on the subject, I have been enabled to save you from such a fate; but I am sorry to say that, for the safety of all parties, you must endure an absence from your friends for some time."

He paused, as if expecting a reply; and Pauline, after a moment's consideration, determined to answer, in order to draw from him, if possible, some further information concerning the manner in which he had become acquainted with her movements, and also in regard to her future destination. "I perceive, sir," said she, "from your language, that you belong to the same rank of society as myself; but I am at a loss to imagine how any gentleman presumes to attribute dangerous enterprises, and actions deserving imprisonment, to a lady, of whom he neither does nor can know any thing."

"My dear young lady," replied her companion, "you make me smile. I did not think that I should have to put forth my diplomatic powers against so fair and so youthful an opponent. But allow me to remind you that, when young ladies of the highest rank are found masquerading in the streets at night, dressed in their servants' garments, they subject their conduct, perhaps, to worse misconstructions than that which I have put upon yours. But, Mademoiselle de Beaumont, I know you, and I know the spirit of your family too well to suppose that any thing but some great and powerful motive could induce you to appear as you do now. Withdraw that bandage from your eyes (I have no fear of encountering them), and look if that be a dress in which Mademoiselle de Beaumont should be seen."

Pauline's quick fingers instantly removed the handkerchief, and raising her eyes, she found that she was placed exactly before a tall Venetian mirror, which offered her a complete portrait of herself, sitting in an immense arm-chair of green velvet, and disguised in the costume of a Languedoc paysanne. The large capote, or hood, which she had worn, had been thrust back by the Norman, in order to blindfold her eyes, and her dark hair, all dishevelled, was hanging about her face in glossy confusion. The red serge jupe of Louise had acquired in the passages of the Bastille no inconsiderable portion of dust; and near the knee on which she had fallen at the foot of the glacis, it was stained with mire, as well as slightly torn. In addition to all this, appeared a large rent at the side, occasioned by the efforts of Philip the woodman to disengage it from the staple on which it had caught; and the black bodice had been broadly marked with green mould, in pressing against the wall while the guards passed so near to her

Her face also was deathly pale, with all the alarm, agitation, and fatigue she had undergone; so that no person could be more different from the elegant and blooming Pauline de Beaumont than the figure which that mirror reflected. Pauline almost started when she beheld herself; but quickly recovering from her surprise, she cast her eyes round the room, which was furnished in the most splendid and costly manner, and filled with a thousand objects of curiosity or luxury, procured from all the quarters of the globe.

Her attention, however, rested not upon any of these. Within a few paces of the chair in which she sat stood a tall elegant man, near that period of life called the middle age, but certainly rather below than above the point to which the term is generally applied. He was splendidly dressed, according to the custom of the day; and the neat trimming of his beard and mustaches, the regular arrangement of his dark flowing hair, and the scrupulous harmony and symmetry of every part of his apparel, contradicted the thoughtful, dignified expression of his eyes, which seemed occupied with much higher thoughts. Vandyke has transmitted to us many such a physiognomy, and many such a dress; but few of his costumes are more splendid, or his countenances more dignified, than was that of the stranger who stood beside Mademoiselle de Beaumont.

He paused for a moment, giving her time to make what examination she liked of every thing in the apartment; and as her eye glanced to himself, demanded with a smile, "Well, Mademoiselle de Beaumont, do you recollect me?"

"Not in the least," replied Pauline: "I think, sir, that we can never have seen each other before."

"Yes, we have," answered her companion, "but it was at a distance. However, now look in that glass, and tell me—do you recollect yourself?"

"Hardly," replied Pauline, with a blush, "hardly, indeed!"

"Well, then, fair lady, I think that you will no longer demand my reasons for attributing to your dangerous enterprises and actions, as you say, deserving imprisonment ; but to put an end to your doubts at once, look at that order, where, I think, you will find yourself somewhat accurately described." And he handed to Pauline a small piece of parchment, beginning with the words of serious import "De par le roy," and going on to order the arrest of the Demoiselle Pauline, daughter of the late Marquis de Beaumont, and of the dame Anne de la Hauteière ; with all those good set terms and particulars, which left no room for mistake or quibble, even if it had been examined by the eyes of the sharpest lawyer of the Cour des Aides.

"What say you now, Mademoiselle de Beaumont?" demanded her companion, seeing her plunged in embarrassment and surprise.

"I have nothing to say, sir," replied Pauline, "but that I must submit. However, I trust that, in common humanity, I shall be allowed to see my mother, either when I am in prison, or before I am conveyed thither."

"You mistake me," said the other ; "you are not going to a prison. I only intend that you should take a little journey into the country ; during the course of which all attention shall be paid to your comfort and convenience. Of course, young lady, when you undertook the difficult task of conveying a message from the queen to a prisoner in the Bastille, you were prepared to risk the consequences. As you have not succeeded, no great punishment will fall upon you ; but as it is absolutely necessary to the government to prevent all communication between suspected parties, you must bear a temporary absence from the court, till such time as this whole business be terminated ; for neither the queen, nor any one else, must know how far you have succeeded or failed."

Pauline pleaded hard to be allowed to see her mother, but in vain ; the stranger was obdurate, and would listen to neither entreaties, promises, nor remonstrances. All she could obtain was, the assurance that Madame de Beaumont should be informed of her safety, and that, perhaps, after a time, she might be permitted to write to her. "Listen to me," said the stranger, cutting short the prayers by which she was attempting to influence him. "I expect the king and court from Chantilly within an hour, and before that time you must be out of Paris. For your convenience, a female servant shall attend you, and you will meet with all the respect due to your rank; but for your own sake, ask no questions, for I never permit my domestics to canvass my affairs with any one—nay, they are forbidden ever to mention my name, except for some express and permitted purpose. I will now leave you, and send Mathurine to your assistance, who will help you to change your dress from that coffre. You will then take some refreshment, and set out as speedily as possible. At the end of your journey you will meet with one to whose care I have recommended you, and you will then learn in whose hands you are placed. At present, I have the honour of bidding you farewell."

The uncertainty of her fate, the separation from her mother, the vague uneasy fear attendant upon want of all knowledge of whither she was going, and the impossibility of communicating with her friends under any event, raised up images far more terrifying and horrible to the mind of Pauline, than almost any specific danger could have done; and, as her companion turned away, she hid her face in her hands and wept.

Hearing her sob, and perhaps attributing her tears to other motives, he returned for a moment, and said in a low voice, "Do not weep, my dear child! I give you my honour, that you will be well and kindly treated. But one thing I forgot to mention. I know that your object was to visit the Count de Blè nau; and I know, also, that a personal interest had something to do in the matter. Now, Mademoiselle de Beaumont, I can feel for you; and it may be some comfort to know, that M. de Blè nau has, at least, one person in the council, who will strive to give to the proceedings against him as much leniency as circumstances will admit."

This said, he quitted the apartment, and in a moment after Pauline was joined by the female servant of whom he had spoken. She was a staid, reputable-looking woman of about fifty, with a little of the primness of ancient maidenhood, but none of its acerbity; and, aware of Pauline's rank, she assisted her to disentangle herself from her uncomfortable disguise. "Mon Dieu ! Une demoiselle mise comme ça." She then called the young lady's attention to the contents of the coffre, asking which dress she would choose to wear; when, to her surprise, Pauline found that it contained a considerable part of her own wardrobe. Forgetting the prohibition to ask questions, she could not help demanding of Mathurine how her clothes could come there; but the servant was either ignorant, or pretended to be so, and Pauline could obtain no information. As soon as she was dressed, some refreshments were placed on the table by Mathurine, who received them from a servant at one of the doors, which she immediately closed again, and pressed Pauline to eat. Pauline at first refused; but at length, to satisfy her companion, who continued to insist upon it with a degree of quiet, persevering civility, that would take no refusal, she took some of the coffee, which was at that time served up as a rarity. As soon as ever the domestic perceived that no entreaty would induce her to taste any thing else, she called in a servant to carry the coffre to the carriage, and then notified to Pauline that it was time for them to depart.

Pauline felt that all resistance or delay would be vain; and she accordingly followed Mathurine down a magnificent staircase into a court-yard, where stood a chaise roulante, the door of which was held open by the Norman we have already mentioned, while two men-servants appeared ready-mounted to follow the vehicle, as soon as it set out. Mathurine placed herself by Pauline's side when she had entered; and the Norman, having closed the door, opened the porte-cochère of the court, and the carriage drove out into the street.

We will not take the trouble of following Mademoiselle de Beaumont on her journey, which occupied that night and the two following days:—suffice it to say, that on the evening of the second day they arrived in the beautiful neighbourhood of Château du Loir. The smiling slopes, covered with the first vines; the rich fruit-trees hanging actually over the road, and dropping with the latest gifts of liberal nature; the balmy air of a warm September evening; the rosy cheeks of the peasantry: and the clear, smooth windings of the river Loir,* all announced that they were approaching the land of happy Touraine: and after putting her head more than once from the window, Mathurine, with a smile of pleasure, pointed forward, exclaiming, "Voilà le Château."

Pauline's eyes followed to the point where the other's hand directed them; and upon a high ground, rising gently above the trees which crowned a little projecting turn of the river, she beheld a group of towers and pinnacles, with the conical-slatted roofs, multifarious weather-cocks, long narrow windows, one turret upon the back of another, and all the other distinctive marks of an old French château.

CHAPTER XXIII.

I CAN easily imagine myself, and I dare say the reader will not find much difficulty in fancying, that the Count de Blénau suffered not a little inquietude while he remained in uncertainty respecting Pauline's free exit from the Bastille.

Take and draw him, as Sterne did his captive. See him walking up and down the chamber with the anxiety of doubt upon his brow and in his heart, listening for every sound in the court-yard, catching the footstep of the sentinel at his door, and fancying it the return of the governor,—hope struggling against fear, and fear remaining victor,—conjuring up a thousand wild, improbable events, and missing the true one; and, in short, making his bosom a hell wherein to torment his own heart.

Thus did Claude de Blénau, during that lapse of time which the governor might reasonably be supposed to be occupied in the duties of his office. But when a longer time passed, and still no news arrived of Pauline's escape, the uncertainty became too great for mortal endurance; and he was about to risk all, by descending into the court through the turret, when the challenge of the sentinel announced the approach of some one, and in the next moment the governor entered the room, his pale features flushed with anger, and his lip quivering with ill-subdued rage.

"Monsieur de Blè nau," said he, in a tone that he had never before presumed to use towards his wealthy prisoner, "here is something wrong. There has been a woman in the prison to-night, passing for that rascal woodman's daughter, and I am given to understand, that she has brought either letter or message to you. But I will ascertain the truth—by Heaven! I will ascertain the truth!"

"Have you detained her, then?" exclaimed de Blè nau, losing all caution in his fears for Pauline.

"Oh, ho! Monsieur le Comte," said the governor, fixing on him his keen and angry eye; "then you do know that she has been here? But do you know, sir, that it may cost me my head?"

"Very possibly, if you tell any body," replied De Blè nau; who by this time had recovered his self-possession, and had, upon reconsideration, drawn from the governor's speech a different conclusion from that which he had formed at first; feeling sure, that if Pauline had not escaped, his anger would have taken a calmer form. "Listen to me, Sir Governor," continued he firmly, after having determined in his own mind the line of conduct which he ought to pursue: "let us deal straightforwardly towards each other, and like friends as we have hitherto done. We are both in some degree in each other's power. On your part, do not attempt to entrap me into any acknowledgment, and I will show you that I will not make use of any advantage you may have given me."

"I do not understand your meaning, sir," cried the governor, still angrily: "I have given you no advantage. By Heaven! I will have the apartment searched;—ay, sir, and your person too."

"Will you so?" replied De Blè nau, coolly drawing from his bosom the queen's billet, and approaching the edge to the lamp, so that it caught fire. The governor started forward to seize it; but the strong arm of the count held him at a distance, till the few lines the queen had written were irretrievably destroyed; and then freeing him from his grasp, he pointed to a chair, saying, "Now, Monsieur le Gouverneur, sit down and listen to a few words of common sense." The governor placed himself in the chair with a look of bitter malignity; but this softened down gradually into an expression of thoughtful cunning, as De Blè nau proceeded.—"Thus stands the case," said the count: "I was committed to your charge, I think, with positive orders not to allow me communication with any person whatsoever—was it not so?" The governor assented. "It so happened, however," continued the count with a smile, "that at our very first interview, you conceived a friendship for me of the most liberal and disinterested nature,"—the governor bit his lip,—"a sort of love at first sight; and, for the sake of my accommodation, you not only broke through the positive commands of the cardinal prime minister, in suffering me once to have communication with another person, but allowed such to take place at all times according to my pleasure; and also took especial pains to procure the attendance of the person I wished, paying him with my money, for which, and other excellent purposes, you have, within the space of six days, received from me upwards of one thousand crowns."

The governor winced most desperately; and fully convinced that a tale so told, would readily convey his head under the axe of the executioner, if it reached the ears of Richelieu, he cursed himself for a fool, De Blè nau for a knave, and Philip the woodman for something between the two; most devoutly wishing both the others at the gallows, so he could slip his own neck out of the halter.

De Blè nau, without much skill in reading the mind's construction by the face, easily divined what was passing in his companion's bosom; and perceiving him to be much in the situation of a lame dog, he resolved still to apply the lash a little, before he helped him over the stile. "Well, Sir Governor," continued he, "now we will suppose, as a mere hypothesis to reason upon, that through this very liberty which your disinterested kindness has allowed me, I have received those communications from without, which it was the cardinal's great object to prevent. How ought you to act under such circumstances? Ought you to go to the stern, unrelenting Richelieu, and say to him,—‘ May it please your eminence, I have intentionally and wilfully broken through every order you gave me—I have taken the utmost pains that they should not be observed; and I have so far succeeded in thwarting your designs, that Monsieur de Blè nau, from whom I have received one thousand crowns, and from whom I expect a thousand more the moment he is liberated—I say, that this good friend of mine, and your enemy, has gained all the information which you wished to prevent.’—This would be a pretty confession of faith!”

De Blè nau paused, and the governor bit his lip; but after a moment, he looked the count full in the face, and replied, “ Perhaps it might be the best way.”

De Blè nau, however, was not to be deceived; he saw terror in the deadly hue of the governor's pale cheek, and the anxious rolling of his sunken eye, and he went on—“ Perhaps it might be the best way—to have your head struck off without delay; for what would your confession avail the cardinal now, after the mischief is done?—Would it not be better to say to yourself,—‘ Here is a young nobleman, whom I believe to be innocent—for whom I have a regard—whom I have served already, and who is both willing and able to reward any one who does serve him; and who, lastly, will never betray me, let happen what will. Under these circumstances, should I not be a fool of the first water to inquire into a matter, the truth of which I am very unlikely to discover, and which, if I do, it will be my duty to disclose? whereas, standing as the affair does now, without my knowledge in the least, my ignorance makes my innocence, and I betray no one. Even supposing that the whole be found out, I am no worse than I was before, for the story can but be told at last; while, if the count be liberated, which most likely he will, instead of losing my office or my head, I shall gain a thousand crowns to indemnify me for all the trouble I have had, and shall insure his friendship for life.' Now, Monsieur le Gouverneur, this is what you ought to say to yourself. In my opinion, the strength of argument is all on one side. Even if there were any thing to know, you would be a fool to investigate it, where you must of necessity be your own accuser: where all is to be lost, and nothing can be gained."

"You argue well, Monsieur de Blènaux," answered the governor, thoughtfully; "and your reasoning would be convincing, if it extended to all the circumstances of the case. But you do not know one half;—you do not know that Chavigni, from whose eyes nothing seems hidden, knew of this girl's coming, and sent me an order to detain her, which that sottish fool, the porter, never gave me till she had escaped.—How am I to get over that, pray?"

"Then, positively, she has escaped?" demanded De Blènaux.

"Yes, yes, she has escaped!" replied the governor pettishly: "you seem to consider nothing but her; but let me tell you, Monsieur de Blènaux, that you are fully as much concerned as I am, for if they discover that she has got in, you will have a touch of the peine forte et dure, to make you confess who she is, and what she came for."

"Truly, I know not what can be done," answered the count. "Chavigni seems to know all about it."

"No, no! he does not know all," replied the governor; "for he says here, in his note, that if a young lady, dressed in a jupe of red serge, with a black bodice, comes to the gate of the prison, asking any thing concerning the Count de Blènaux, we are to detain her. Now she never mentioned your name, and, God knows, I heeded not what she was dressed in."

"Then the matter is very simple," replied the count; "no such person as he bade you detain has been here. This is no matter of honour between man and man, where you are bound to speak your suspicions as well as your knowledge. No person has come to the gate of the prison asking any thing concerning me; and so answer Chavigni."

"But the porter, Monsieur de Blènaux," said the officer, anxiously, "he may peach. All the other dependents on the prison are my own, placed by me, and would turn out were I to lose my office; but this porter was named by the cardinal himself.—What is to be done with him?"

"Oh! fear not him," answered De Blènaux; "as his negligence was the cause of your not receiving the order in time to render it effectual, your silence will be a favour to him."

"True! true!" cried the governor, rubbing his hands with all the rapture of a man suddenly relieved from a mortal embarrassment: "True! true! I'll go and bully him directly—I'll threaten to inform the cardinal, and Chavigni, and the whole council; and then—when he begins to fancy that he feels the very rope round his neck—I'll relent, and be charitable, and agree to conceal his mistake, and to swear that the lady never came.—How will Chavigni know? She will never confess it herself, and at that hour it was too dark for any one to watch her up to the gates.—Morbleu! that will do precisely."

"I see little or no danger attending upon it," said the prisoner; "and, at all events, it is a great deal better than conveying your neck into the noose, which you would certainly do by confessing to Richelieu the circumstances as they have occurred."

"Well, well, we will risk it, at all events," replied the governor, who, though not quite free from apprehension respecting the result, had now regained his usual sweet complacency of manner. "But one thing, Monsieur de Blènaux, I am sure you will promise me; namely, that this attempt shall never be repeated, even if occasion should occur; and for the rest—with regard to your never betraying me, and other promises which your words imply, I will trust to your honour."

De Blènaux readily agreed to what the governor required, and repeated his promises never to disclose any thing that had occurred, and to reward his assistance with a thousand crowns, upon being liberated. Mindful of all who served him, he did not forget Philip the woodman; and, deeply thankful for the escape of Pauline, was the more anxious to ascertain the fate of one who had so greatly contributed to the success of her enterprise.

"Speak not of him ! speak not of him !" exclaimed the governor, breaking forth into passion at De Blè nau's inquiries. "This same skilful plotter attends upon you no longer. You will suffer some inconvenience for your scheme ; but it is your fault, not mine, and you must put up with it as best you may."

"That I care not about," replied De Blè nau. "But I insist upon it that he be treated with no severity. Mark me, Monsieur le Gouverneur : if I find that he is ill used, Chavigni shall hear of the whole business. I will risk any thing sooner than see a man suffer from his kindness for me."

"You paid him well, of course," said the governor, drawing up his lip, "and he must take his chance. However, do not alarm yourself for him : he shall be taken care of—only, with your good leave, Seigneur Comte, you and he do not meet again within the walls of the Bastille. —But, in the name of Heaven ! what clatter is this at the door?" he exclaimed, starting from his chair, at a most unusual noise which proceeded from the staircase.

The governor, indeed, had good reason to be astonished ; for never was there a more strange and inconsistent sound heard within the walls of a prison, than that which saluted their ears. First came the "Qui Vive ?" of the sentinel ; to which a voice roared out, "Le Diable !" "Qui Vive ?" cried the sentinel again, in a still sharper key. The answer to this was nothing but a clatter, as the governor expressed it, such as we might suppose produced by the blowing up of a steam-kitchen : then followed the discharge of the sentinel's firelock ; and then sundry blows given and received upon some hard and sonorous substance, mingled with various oaths, execrations, and expletives, then in use amongst the lower classes of his Christian Majesty's lieges, making altogether a most deafening din.

At this sound the governor, as little able to conceive whence it originated as De Blè nau himself, drew his sword, and throwing open the door, discovered the redoubtable Jacques Chatpilleur, Cuisinier Aubergiste, striding in triumph over the prostrate body of the sentinel, and waving over his head an immense stew-pan, being the weapon with which he had achieved the victory, and through which appeared a small round hole, caused by the ball of the soldier's firelock. In the mean while was to be seen the sentinel on the ground, his iron morion actually dented by the blows of his adversary, and his face and garments bedabbled, not with blood, indeed, but with the Poulet en blanquette and its white sauce, which had erst been tenant of the stew-pan.

"Victoria! victoria! victoria!" shouted the aubergiste, waving his stew-pan: "Twice have I conquered in one night! Can Mieleraye or Bouillon say that? Victoria! victoria!" But here his triumph received a check; for looking into the unhappy utensil, he suddenly perceived the loss of its contents, which had flown all over the place, the treacherous lid having detached itself during his conflict with the sentinel, and sought safety in flight down the stairs. "Mon Poulet! mon Poulet!" exclaimed he, in a tone of bitter despair, "le nid y est mais, l'oiseau est parti—(the nest is there, but the bird is flown). Hélas, mon Poulet! mon pauvre Poulet!" and quitting the body of his prostrate foe, he advanced into the apartment with that sort of zig-zag motion, which showed that the thin sinewy shanks which supported his woodcock-shaped upper man, were somewhat affected by a more than usual quantity of the generous grape.

The whole scene was so inexpressibly ludicrous, that De Blénau burst into an immoderate fit of laughter, in which the governor could not help joining, notwithstanding his indignation at the treatment the sentinel had experienced. Recovering himself, however, he poured forth his wrath upon the aubergiste in no measured terms, demanding how he dared to conduct himself so in the royal chateau of the Bastille, and what had become of the Count de Blénau's supper, adding a few qualificatory epithets, which may as well be omitted.

"Eh bien, monsieur! Eh bien!" cried the aubergiste, with very little respect for the governor: "as for the gentleman there, lying on his belly, he ought to have let me in, and not fired his piece at me. He knew me well enough. He might have cried Qui vive? once—that was well, as it is the etiquette.”

“But why did you not answer him, sacré maraud?” cried the governor.

“I did answer him,” replied the other, stoutly. “He cried Qui vive? and I answered Le Diable, car le Diable vive toujours. And as for the supper, I have lost it all. Je l’ai perdu entre deux mâtons. The first was a greedy Norman vagabond, who feeds at my auberge; and while I was out for a minute, he whips me up my matelot d’anguille from out of the casserole, and my dinde piquée from the spit, and when I came back five minutes after, there was nothing left but bare bones and empty bottles. Pardie! And now I have bestowed on the head of that varlet a poulet en blanquette that might have comforted the stomach of a king. Oh, Dieu! Dieu! mes malheurs, ne finiront jamais. Oh! but I forgot,” he continued, “there is still a fricandeau à l’oseille with a cold paté, that will do for want of a better.—Monseigneur, votre serviteur,” and he bowed five or six times to De Blénart; “Monsieur le Gouverneur, votre très humble ;” and bowing round and round to every one, even to the sentinel, who by this time was beginning to recover his feet, the tipsy aubergiste staggered off, escaping the wrath of the governor by the promise of the fricandeau, but not, however, without being threatened with punishment on the morrow.

CHAPTER XXIV.

“MARTEVILLE, you have served me essentially,” said the Count de Chavigni, as soon as he had left Pauline in what was called the ladies’ hall of the Hôtel de Bouthilliers, and addressing the tall Norman, whom the reader has already recognised beyond a doubt. “You know I never suffer any good service to go without its reward;

therefore I will now pay you yours, more especially as I have fresh demands to make upon your zeal. Let us see how our accounts stand ;” and approaching a small table, which served both for the purposes of a writing-desk and also to support a strong ebony cabinet clasped with silver, he drew forth a bunch of keys and opened a drawer plated with iron, which contained a quantity of gold and silver coin. Chavigni then seated himself at the table, and the Norman standing on his right hand, they began regularly to balance accounts, the items of the Norman’s charge being various services of rather curious nature.

“For stopping the archduke’s carrier,” said Chavigni, “and taking from him his despatches—fifty crowns is enough for that.”

“I demand no more,” said Marteville ; “any common thief could have done it.”

“But, by the way, I hope you did not hurt him, for he came with a safe conduct.”

“Hurt him! no,” replied the Norman ; “we are the best friends in the world. When I met him on the road, I told him civilly that I must have his despatches ; and that I would either cut his throat or drink a bottle with him, whichever he liked : so he chose the latter, and when we parted, he promised to give me notice the next time he came on the same errand.”

“The rascal !” said Chavigni. “That is the way we are served. But now we come to this business of the Count de Blénau—what do you expect for the whole concern?”

“Nay, but, monseigneur, you forget,” exclaimed the other ; “there is one little item before that. Put down, —for being an astrologer.”

“Why, I have given you fifty crowns on that account already,” rejoined the statesman ; “you are exorbitant, Seigneur Marteville.”

“That fifty crowns went for my expenses—all of it,” replied the other. “There was my long black robe all covered with gimcracks ; there was my leathern belt, painted with all the signs under heaven ; there was my white beard and wig, which cost me ten good crowns at the shop of Jansen the perruquier; besides the harness of my horse, which was made to suit, and my astrologer's bonnet, which kept all fast upon my head. Now, monseigneur, you cannot give me less than fifty crowns, for being out two nights, and running the risk of being burnt alive."

"I think not," said Chavigni, "so let that pass. But to come to the other business."

"Why, first and foremost," replied the Norman, marking each article as he named it, by laying the index of his right hand upon one of the immense fingers of his left,— 'for making love to mademoiselle's maid."

"Nay, nay, nay!" cried Chavigni, "this is too much. That must be part of the dower I have promised with her, of which we will talk presently. But have you married her?"

"No," answered the Norman, "not yet. We will see about that hereafter."

Chavigni's cheek reddened, and his brow knit into a heavy frown. "No evasions, sir. I commanded you, when you took her away last night from Chantilly, to marry her directly, and you agreed to do so. Why is it not done?"

"If the truth must be told, monseigneur, it is not done, because it goes against a Norman gentleman's stomach to take up with any body's cast-offs."

"Do not be insolent, sir," cried the statesman. "Did I not give you my honour that your suspicion was false? Know, sir, that though Chavigni may sometimes condescend to converse with you, or may appear to trifle for a moment with a girl like this Louise, it is merely to gain some greater object that he does so; and that unless it be for some state purpose, he never honours such beings with his thoughts."

"Well, well, monseigneur," replied the other, seeing the fire that flashed in his lord's eye, "I will marry her: Foy de Normand! Don't be angry; I will marry her."

"Foy de Normand will not do," said Chavigni. "It must be this very night."

"Eh bien! Eh bien! Soit," cried the Norman, and then muttered to himself with a grin, "I've four wives now living; a fifth won't make much difference."

"What murmur you, sir?" demanded the statesman. "Mark me: in one hour from hence you will find a priest and two witnesses in the cardinal's chapel. When you are married, the priest will give you a certificate of the ceremony; carry it to my intendant, and upon the sight of it he will pay you the sum we agree upon. Now, proceed with your demands."

"Well, then, monseigneur," continued Marteville, "what is the information concerning mademoiselle's coming to Paris worth?"

"It is worth a good deal," replied Chavigni, "and I will always pay more for knowledge of that kind than any acts of brute force. Set that down for a hundred crowns, and fifty more for catching the young lady, and bringing her here; making altogether two hundred and fifty."

"Yes, sir, yes; but the dot—the dowry you mentioned," cried the Norman. "You have forgot that."

"No, I have not," replied Chavigni. "In favour of Louise, I will make the sum up one thousand crowns, which you will receive the moment you have married her."

"Oh! I'll marry her directly, if that be the case," cried the Norman. "Morbleu! that makes all the difference."

"But treat her kindly," said Chavigni. "With a stipend of a thousand crowns, which I allow you yearly, and what you can gain by particular services, you may live very well; and perhaps I may add some little gratification, if you please me in your conduct towards your wife."

"Oh! I'll be the tenderest husband living," cried the Norman, "since my gratification depends upon her's. But I'll run and fetch her to be married directly, if you will send the priest, monseigneur."

"Nay, stop a moment," said the statesman. "You forget that I told you I had other journeys for you to take and other services for you to perform."

"No, sir," answered the Norman, "all is prepared to set out this very night, if you will tell me my errand."

Chavigni paused for a moment, and remained in deep thought, gnawing his lip as if embarrassed by doubts as to the best manner of proceeding. "Mark me, Marteville," said he at length: "there are two or three sorts of scoundrels in the world, amongst whom I do not look upon you as the least." The Norman bowed with the utmost composure, very well aware of the place he held in Chavigni's opinion. "There are, however, some good points about you," continued the statesman; at which Marteville bowed again. "You would rob, kill, and plunder, I believe, without remorse, any one you hated or did not care about; but I do not think you would forget a kindness or betray a trust."

"Never!" said the Norman: "red-hot pincers will not tear from me what is intrusted to my honour."

"So be it, then, in the present instance," said Chavigni; "for I am obliged to give you the knowledge of some things, and to enter into explanations with you, which I do not often do with any one. You must know, then, I have information that on the same day that Monsieur de Cinq Mars set out from Chantilly with Monsieur de Thou, the Duke of Orleans, with Montressor and St. Ibal, took their departure from Moulins, and the Count de Fonttrailles from Paris. They all journeyed towards the same point in Champagne. I can trace Fonttrailles to Troyes, the duke and his companions to Villeneuve, and Cinq Mars and De Thou to Nogent, but no farther. All this might be accidental, but there are circumstances that create suspicion in my mind. Cinq Mars, when he set forth, gave out that he went to his estate near Troyes, in which I find he never set his foot; and when he returned, his conference with Louis was somewhat long. It might have been of hawks and hounds, it is true; but after it the king's manner both to the cardinal and myself was cold and haughty, and he suddenly took this resolution of coming to Paris himself to examine into the case of the young Count de Blénau:—in short, I suspect that some plot is on foot. What I require of you then is, to hasten down to Champagne. There, try to trace each of these persons, and discover if they had a conference, and where; find out the business that brought each of them so far, examine their track as you would the slot of a deer, and give me whatever information you collect; employ every means to gain a thorough knowledge of their proceedings—force, should it be required—but let that be the last thing used. Here is this signet, upon the sight of which all the agents of government in the different towns and villages will communicate with you.” And he drew from his finger a small seal ring, which the Norman consigned to his pocket, his hands being somewhat too large to admit of his wearing it in the usual manner.

“The Duke of Orleans and his pack I know well,” answered Marteville, “and also Cinq Mars and De Thon; but this Count de Fontrailles—what like is he, monseigneur?”

“He is a little ugly, mean-looking man,” replied Chavigni: “he frequently dresses himself in gray, and looks like a sorcerer. Make him your first object; for if ever there was a devil of cunning upon earth, it is Fontrailles, and he is at the bottom of the plot if there be one.”

“You traced him to Troyes, you say, monseigneur? Had he any pretence of business there?”

“None,” answered Chavigni: “my account says that he had no attendants with him, lodged at the Auberge du Grand Soleil, and was poorly dressed.”

“I will trace him if he were the devil himself,” said the Norman; “and before I see you again, monseigneur, I shall be able to account for each of these gentry.”

“If you do,” said Chavigni, “a thousand crowns is your reward; and if you discover any plot or treasonable enterprise, so that by your means they may be foiled and brought to justice, the thousand shall grow into ten thousand, and you shall have a place that will give you a life of luxury.”

The Norman’s eyes sparkled at the anticipation, and his imagination portrayed himself and his five wives living together in celestial harmony, drinking the best vintages of Burgundy and Epernay, eating of the fat of the land, and singing like mad. These blissful ideas were first interrupted by the sound of horses' feet in the court. "Hark!" cried Chavigni, "they are putting the horses to the carriage; go down, and see that all be prepared for the young lady's journey."

"Instantly," answered the Norman; "and after that I will carry Louise to the priest, finger your lordship's cash, and we will set off for Troyes."

"Do you intend to take her with you?" demanded Chavigni, in some surprise.

"Nay, my lord, you would not wish me to leave my bride on our wedding-night, surely," replied the Norman, in a mock sentimental tone. "But the truth is, I think she may be useful. Woman's wit will often find a way where man's wisdom looks in vain; and as I have now, thanks to your bounty, two good horses, I shall e'en set Louise upon one of them, and with the bridle-rein over my arm, lead her to Brie, where, with your good leave, we will sleep, and thence on upon our journey. Travelling with a woman, no one will suspect my real object, and I shall come sooner at my purpose."

"Well, so be it then," answered the statesman. "You are now, as you wished to be, intrusted with an affair of more importance than stopping a courier, or carrying off a weak girl; and as the reward is greater, so would be the punishment in case you were to betray your trust. I rely on your honour; but let me hint at the same time, that there is such a thing as the rack, which has more than once been applied to persons who reveal state secrets. Keep good account of your expenses, and such as are truly incurred for the government, the government will pay."

Thus ended the conference between Chavigni and the Norman, neither of whom we shall follow much farther. Of Chavigni, it is only necessary to say, that immediately after the departure of Pauline, he proceeded to the Louvre to wait the arrival of Louis the Thirteenth, who soon after entered Paris, accompanied by the queen, Cinq Mars, and all the usual attendants of the court, and followed by the cardinal and those members of the council who had not previously arrived along with Chavigni.

In regard to the Norman, inspired by the agreeable prospect of a thousand crowns, he was not long in visiting the chapel of the Palais Cardinal, where the priest speedily united him to a black-eyed damsel that he brought in his hand. Who this was, it does not suit me to discover to the reader. If he have found it out already, I cannot help it; but if he have not, I vow and protest that in the whole course of this true history I will afford him no farther explanation; no, not even in the last sentence of the last page.

Immediately after their marriage, the Norman put his bride upon horseback and proceeded to Brie, each carrying behind them a valise, containing a variety of articles which would doubtless greatly edify the reader to learn, but which unfortunately cannot now be detailed at full length, the schedule having been lost some years after by one of the Norman's collateral descendants in the great fire of London, where it had found its way in consequence of the revocation of the edict of Nantes. All that can be affirmed with certainty is, that in the valise of the Norman were three shirts and a half with falling collars, according to the fashion of that day; a pourpoint or doublet of blue velvet, (which was his best), and a cloak to match; also (of the same stuff) a haut de chausses which was a machine then used for the same purpose as a pair of breeches now a days; and over and above all the rest was his astrologer's robe and grey beard, folded round a supernumerary brace of pistols, and a small stiletto. Into the lady's wardrobe we shall not inquire; suffice it to say, that it accompanied its mistress safe from Brie to Troyes, where putting up at the Grand Soleil, the Norman began his perquisitions concerning Fonttrailles.

Now, having left all my friends and acquaintances at sixes and sevens, I shall close this chapter; and if the reader be interested in their fate he may go on.

CHAPTER XXV.

STRANGE to say, in the manuscript notes from which this true history is derived, there occurs the most extraordinary omission that perhaps ever appeared in the writings of any one pretending to accuracy; and most provoking of all, I have searched memoirs and annals, histories and letters, state papers and private memoranda, and have consulted all sorts of tradition, oral and written, without being enabled to supply from any other source the neglect of the original historian. Who would believe that, after having interested the reader so deeply in the character of Jacques Chatpilleur, Cuisinier Aubergiste, the writer of the above-mentioned notes would be so inconsiderate, so stupid, so disappointing, as not to say one word concerning the farther progress of the redoubtable vivandier on that night, wherein he achieved the two famous victories which have been recorded? But so it is: instead of giving us a pathetic account of the scanty supper he at length contrived to furnish forth for the noble prisoner, or of satisfying our curiosity in regard to the means he employed to appease the wrath of the governor, the notes skip over the farther proceedings of that entire night, and bring us at once upon the Count de Blénau's levee the next morning; entering into very minute details concerning the difficulties he encountered in arranging his mustaches, buttoning his pourpoint, &c. without assistance; all of which I shall pass over as contemptible and irrelevant, and below the dignity of authentic history.

With the embarrassment of the Count de Blénau's mind we have something more to do; and to tell the truth, the more he reflected upon his situation, the more he was puzzled in regard to his future conduct. A fresh examination, either by Lafemas or some member of the council, was to be expected speedily, under which he must do one of three unpleasant things—either still refuse to answer, which would infallibly be followed by the peine forte et dure—or he must acknowledge that the queen had privily conveyed him an order to confess all, which would involve his royal mistress, and himself, and Pauline in dangers, of which he hardly knew the extent—or he must reply to the questions he had before refused to answer, and disclose what had been intrusted to his honour, without showing that he was authorized to do so; in which case, the reproach of treachery and cowardice must inevitably fall upon his name. This was a dilemma with three horns, and each very sharp; so that it was difficult to determine which to jump upon, and seemingly impossible to avoid them all. De Blénau was sadly chewing the cud of these bitter doubts, when he heard some one enter the outer chamber; and the moment after, the very privacy of his bedroom was invaded by the governor, who entered with a countenance pale and agitated, and who, like all people who have something horrible to communicate, begged him not to be alarmed, in a tone that was enough to frighten him out of his wits.

"Alarmed at what?" demanded the count, summoning courage to encounter the danger, whatever it might be.

"Why, Monsieur de Blénau," answered the governor, "you must prepare yourself to meet the cardinal himself; a messenger has just come to say that he will be here in person without loss of time. He arrived last night at the Palais Cardinal, and brought the king to Paris with him."

"You seem to hold this cardinal in some fear," said De Blénau, almost smiling, amidst his own embarrassment at the evident terror of the governor. "I could have wished that he had given me a little more time for consideration; but I am not so frightened at him as you seem to be, who have nothing to do with it."

"But pray remember, mon cher Comte," cried the governor, "that you promised not to betray me to the cardinal in any case."

De Blénau's lip curled with contempt. "I think you ought to know before this time," answered he, "that I am not likely to betray any one.—But there seems a noise and bustle in the court, in all probability caused by the arrival of the cardinal. Go and receive him, and depend upon me. Of all misfortunes on the earth," continued De Blè nau, mentally, "the curse of cowardice is the most dreadful."

In a few minutes his supposition respecting the arrival of the cardinal was confirmed by a summons to appear before the council in the hall of audience; and with his mind still undecided, he followed the officer across the court to the scene of his former examination.

A difference struck him in the present arrangements of the prison, from those which he had before remarked.

The court, instead of being crowded by such prisoners as had the liberty of walking in it, was now entirely void; and, fixed like marble on each side of the door opening into the audience-hall, was a soldier of the cardinal's guard, between whom stood a clerk, or greffier, of the council-chamber, seemingly waiting for the approach of the prisoner. As soon as De Blè nau was within hearing, the doors were thrown open, and the clerk pronounced, "Claude Count de Blè nau, appear before the king in council."

"The king!" thought De Blè nau: "this cardinal, not content with taking the king's guards, must take his title also!"—But passing on through the open doors he entered the hall, where a very different scene presented itself from that which had before met his eyes in the same place.

The whole further part of the chamber was filled with the officers and attendants of Richelieu; each side, as well as the interstices between the massy pillars that supported the roof, was occupied by a body of the cardinal's guard; and in the chair at the head of the table sat the king himself, with the prime minister on his right hand; while Chavigni, Bouthilliers, Mazarin, and others, occupied seats on either side. To complete the array appeared several clerks, together with the officers of the prison, leaving only the space of about three feet at the bottom of the table, which remained clear for the prisoner to present himself opposite the throne.

Extraordinary as it was for the king himself to sit upon the examination of a state prisoner, the whole demeanour and conduct of the monarch had undergone a change since the return of Cinq Mars, which astonished those about him more than even his resolution to be present at the council held that morning in the Bastille. Even those who were most accustomed to watch the changes of the king's variable disposition, would hardly have recollected in the sovereign, who, with the easy dignity and self-possession of a clear and intelligent mind, presided at the head of the council-table, the same man who in general yielded his very thoughts to the governance of Richelieu, and abandoned all his kingly duties to one whom he appeared both to dislike and dread. But so it was, that, stimulated by some unseen means, Louis seemed suddenly to have resumed the king; and as soon as De Blè nau entered the audience-hall, he at once opened the business of the day himself with all those powers which his mind really possessed when called into activity.

"Monsieur de Blè nau," said the king, "we are glad to see you, and that always a good report, from those that we love, and therefore our confidence in your honour and integrity is great. There will be various questions asked of you to-day by the members of the council present, which much affect the welfare of the kingdom, and our own personal happiness; and to these questions we command you, as a good subject and an honest man, to answer truly, and according to your conscience, without any reservation whatsoever."

Before entering the audience-hall, De Blè nau, well knowing that every careless word might be subject to mis-construction, had determined to speak as little as possible; and therefore, merely answering the king's speech by a profound inclination of the head, he waited in silence for the questions to which he had alluded.

Richelieu, the keen searching glance of whose eyes had been fixed upon him during the whole time, paused for a moment in expectation of a reply; but seeing that he said nothing, the minister proceeded himself. "I have heard with astonishment, Monsieur de Blè nau," said he, "that you have lately refused to answer questions, to which you had before replied in conversation with me; and I can conceive no reason, Sir, why you should object to give satisfaction on these points one day as much as another."

"Nor can I conceive," replied De Blè nau, "any reason why your eminence should cause questions to be put to me again which I had before answered; and that reiteration even while the replies were yet new in your mind."

"My memory might want refreshing," answered the cardinal: "and you must also remember, that the circumstances were very different at the two periods in which those questions were addressed to you. In the first place, you spoke merely in conversation; in the second case, you were a prisoner, and it was therefore necessary that your deposition should be taken from your own mouth.—But all this is irrelevant. The council is not inclined to take notice of your former contumacy, provided you now reply to what shall be asked you."

De Blè nau was again silent, merely bowing to signify that he comprehended, without pledging himself either to answer or not; and Richelieu proceeded with his questions, placing his hand, as he did so, upon a large packet of open letters which lay on the table before him.

"You have already informed me, Monsieur de Blè nau, if I remember rightly," said the minister, "that you have, at various times, forwarded letters for the queen, both by the usual public conveyances and otherwise."

The king fixed his eyes intently upon the count, while he replied at once, "I have done so!"

"Can you remember," continued the cardinal, "during what period you have been accustomed to send these letters for the queen? I mean, of what date was the first?"

"I cannot precisely at this moment call to mind," answered De Blè nau, "but it was shortly after your eminence appointed me, or rather recommended me, to the office of chamberlain to her majesty."

"You see, sire," said Richelieu, turning to the king with a meaning glance, "just before the taking of Arras by the Imperialists——"

"Exactly so, your eminence; I remember it by a circumstance that occurred at the time," interposed De Blè nau misdoubting the effect of the cardinal's comments.

Richelieu gave him a gracious smile for this confirmation of his remark. "Pray, what circumstance was that, Monsieur de Blènaux?" demanded he; but his smile was soon clouded by the count's reply.

"It was, that the lace lappets, in order to procure which her majesty wrote that letter to Brussels, were seized at Arras, that city having fallen into the enemy's hands. The queen was much grieved thereat. You know, monseigneur, ladies set great store by their apparel."

Chavigni smiled, but Richelieu's brow gathered into a heavy frown, and his reply was in that deep, hollow tone of voice, by which alone one could distinguish when he was affected by any powerful feeling. His brow at all times remained calm, except when, as in the present instance, he sought to awe or intimidate; his eye, too, was under command, scanning the passions of others, and expressing none of his own, but those which he himself wished to appear; but his voice betrayed him, and when internally agitated, it would sink to so low and cavernous a sound, that it seemed as if the dead were speaking. It was in this tone that he answered De Blènaux.

"The contents of that letter, sir, are but too well known by their effects. But I am to conclude, from your observation, that you are as well aware of what the queen's letters have contained, as the persons to whom they were addressed."

"Not so, your eminence," replied De Blènaux. "The import of that letter I happened to be acquainted with by accident, but I pretend to no farther knowledge."

"Yes, yes, sir," said Richelieu, "it is very evident that you know well to be informed or not on any subject, as it suits your purpose."

"Nay, Monsieur le Cardinal," interposed the king, "I think the young gentleman answers with all candour and discretion. We do not seek to perplex him, but to hear the truth; and sure I am that he will not discredit his birth or his honour by prevarication."

"Your majesty's own honourable mind does justice to mine," replied the count. "I will own that I am guarded in my speech; for surrounded by those who seek to draw matter from my mouth, on which to found some accusation against me, I were a fool to speak freely. Nevertheless, I will answer truly to whatsoever I do answer; and if there should come a question to which I cannot reply without betraying my duty, I will tell no falsehood, but as I have before, refuse to answer, and the consequences of my honesty be upon my own head."

"Well, sir," said the cardinal, "if you have done the harangue with which you are edifying the council, I will proceed with my questions; but first let me tell you, that I am not disposed to be dared with impunity. I think you denied to me that you had ever forwarded any letters to Don Francisco de Mello, Leopold Archduke of Austria, or Philip King of Spain.—Beware what you say, Claude Count de Blénau!"

"If I understand your eminence rightly," said the prisoner, "you do not ask me whether I ever did forward such letters, but whether I ever denied to you that I did forward them: in which case, I must reply, that I did deny having expedited any letter to Don Francisco de Mello, but the two other names I never touched upon."

"Then you acknowledge that you have conveyed letters from the queen to the archduke and the king of Spain?" demanded Richelieu.

"I have made no such acknowledgement," answered De Blénau; "your eminence puts a forced construction on my words."

"In vain you turn, sir, like a rebellious serpent that strives in its windings to escape the hand that grasps it. At once I ask you, have you or have you not, ever, by any means, expedited any letter from the queen, or other person, to either the Archduke of Austria, or the King of Spain? This, sir, is a question that you cannot get over."

The eyes of the whole council fixed upon the count as the cardinal spoke. De Blénau paused for a moment to recollect himself, and then addressed himself directly to the king. "As a good and faithful subject," he said, "there is a great duty which I owe your majesty, and I believe I have always performed it as I ought; but as a servant of your royal consort the queen, I have other duties, distinct, though I hope in no degree opposed to those which bind me to my king. As a man of honour also and a gentleman, I am bound to betray no trust reposed in me, whether that trust seem to me material or not; and though I feel sure that I might at once answer the questions proposed to me by his Eminence of Richelieu without any detriment or discredit to her majesty, yet so sacred do I hold the confidence of another, that I must decline to reply, whatever be the consequence. However, let me assure you, sire, that no word or deed of her majesty the queen, which has ever come to my ears, has been derogatory to your majesty's dignity, or contrary to your interest."

"Then I am to conclude that you refuse to answer?" said Richelieu sternly: "Think, Monsieur de Blè nau, before you carry your obstinacy too far."

"My conduct does not arise in obstinacy," replied De Blè nau, "but from a sense of what is due to my own honour; and unless it can be shown me that it is her majesty's desire I should inform your eminence of all I know respecting her affairs, from henceforth I hold my tongue, and answer no farther questions whatever."

"Be the consequence on your own head then, young man!" exclaimed the cardinal. "We will now break up the council.—Monsieur de Blè nau, take leave of the sun, for you never see another morrow!"

De Blè nau's courage was unshaken, but yet a cold chilly feeling gathered round his heart as Richelieu bade him take leave of the sun, and rose to break up the council. But still the king kept his seat, and Chavigni, hastily writing a few words on a scrap of paper, handed it to the cardinal, who, after reading it, appeared to think for a moment, and then again addressed De Blè nau. "There is one hope still left for you, sir: did Monsieur de Chavigni understand you rightly, that if you had the queen's command to confess what you know of her affairs, you would answer the questions we put to you?"

De Blè nau breathed freely. "Undoubtedly!" replied he; "my honour will then be satisfied, and there will be no subject on which I shall have a reserve."

"What will you consider a sufficient expression of her majesty's commands to that effect?" asked Chavigni: "I know that his eminence wishes to treat you with all possible lenity, although the mere command of the king in council ought to be sufficient warrant for you to yield any information that may be required."

"We think differently on many points, Monsieur de Chavigni," answered De Blènaux; "but if you can show me her handwriting to any order, or if one of the officers of her household will bear me a message from her majesty to deliver what little I know of her affairs, I will do so without further hesitation."

There was now a momentary consultation carried on in a low voice amongst the various members of the council, apparently concerning which of the queen's attendants should be sent for, but at length Chavigni whispered to the cardinal, "Send for La Rivière: he is a friend of Lafemas, and will do any thing he is bid."

"If Monsieur de La Rivière bear you the queen's commands, will you be satisfied, Sire?" demanded Richelieu.

"The Queen's Gentleman-usher!" said De Blènaux; "most assuredly: that will be sufficient."

"Go yourself, Chavigni," whispered Richelieu, "and as you come, tell him what to say.—We will wait his arrival," he proceeded aloud;—"but see, Monsieur de Chavigni, that he communicates with the queen, and be fully informed of all her views."

De Blènaux smiled, convinced that the information through Pauline that the queen was still at Chantilly, and therefore that though La Rivière might be himself in Paris, and ready to swear any thing the cardinal dictated, he could have no communication with Anne of Austria, unless, what seemed probable, she had returned to the capital with the king.

As soon as Chavigni had retired for the purpose of seeking La Rivière, Richelieu ran his eye over some memoranda, as if about to put further questions to De Blènaux;

the king, not noticing these indications of his purpose, addressed the prisoner himself. "Well, Monsieur le Comte," said he; "while Chavigni is gone, there are two or three points on which I shall be glad to speak with you."

Richelieu was surprised, and not particularly delighted, thinking that the king was about to continue the examination himself, which might not be conducted precisely in such a manner as to produce the effect he wished; but, in the independent mood with which Louis was affected, he dared not, with all his daring, attempt to interrupt the course of his sovereign's proceedings, and therefore remained silent, watching the opportunity of interposing, to give what aid he best could to the interrogatory that appeared about to commence. In the meanwhile De Blè nau bowed his head, calmly prepared to bear the mental torture of a long cross-examination, where every word might be subject to dangerous misconstruction.

"I understand, Monsieur De Blè nau," continued the king, while the whole council listened with attentive expectation—"I understand that you have the best breed of boar-dogs in France. Pray are they of the Pomeranian or the Exul race?—and how can they be procured?"

Richelieu bit his lip; but to De Blè nau the king's question was like the clearing away of a threatened storm; and habitually attached to the chase, as well as deeply learned in all its mysteries, he was delighted to find that Louis turned the conversation to a subject equally familiar to both.

"Mine are the true Pomeranian breed, sire," he replied; "flew an inch deep, with eyes like Sandarak—would light your majesty home at night, if by chance you lost your way. In truth, they are only fit for a monarch; and Cinq Mars has now four couple of the best, in education for your majesty, which, when well trained, and recovered from their wildness, he will present to your majesty in my name; and I humbly hope that you will accept them in aid of your royal sport."

"We shall, we shall; and thank you well, sir count," replied the king, smiling most graciously at the prospect of possessing a breed which he had been long seeking for in vain. "Monsieur le Cardinal, do you hear that? We will hunt with them some day. You used to hunt in your day too; have you quite given it over?"

"I have been too much busied, sire," answered Richelieu gravely, "in hunting from your majesty's dominions Huguenot wolves and Spanish foxes, to pursue other game."

Louis turned from him with an uneasy shrug, expressive of fully as much distaste for Richelieu's employments as the statesman experienced for his; and once more addressing De Blénau, he plunged deep into the science of hunting, hawking, and fowling; giving the young count a thousand receipts, instructions, and anecdotes, which he listened to with the most reverential deference, not only in as much as they proceeded from his sovereign, but also as coming from the most experienced sportsman of the age.

In the mean while, Richelieu was fain to employ himself in writing notes and memoranda, to allay the spleen and irritation that he felt at what he internally termed the king's weak trifling; till at length he was relieved by the return of Chavigni, bringing with him the queen's usher, La Rivière.

De Blénau well knew that this person, who was by birth just within the rank of a gentleman (which word was then in France one of great significance), had been placed in the service of Anne of Austria, for the purpose of acting as a spy upon her, from Richelieu's fear of her correspondence with Spain; but informed, as the count now was, of the queen's wishes, it was perfectly indifferent to him who appeared on her behalf; his only object being, that his mistress's commands, publicly expressed, should in the minds of all, free him from the imputation of having betrayed her.

La Rivière looked round him, as he entered, with a glance not altogether free from apprehension; for though Chavigni had given him full instructions and information concerning the services he was sent for to perform, yet there was something so terrible in the idea of the Bastille, that he could hardly keep his limbs from trembling as he passed the gates of the prison.

‘Come hither, Monsieur de La Rivière,’ exclaimed the cardinal, as soon as he appeared: “We are wasting too much time here.” La Rivière approached, and placed himself in the spot to which Richelieu pointed, almost exactly opposite to De Blénau.

The cardinal then proceeded. “Have you seen her majesty the queen since Monsieur de Chavigni informed you of the wishes of the council?”

“I have, may it please your eminence,” replied La Rivière, in a tremulous voice.

“And what was her majesty’s reply to our request?” asked Richelieu. “Speak boldly!” he added, in a tone only calculated to reach the ear of the usher, who stood close beside him, and showed plainly, by his hesitating manner, that he was under the influence of alarm. The cardinal, however, attributed this to a wrong cause, thinking that La Rivière had not really seen the queen, and was about to play his part, as prompted by Chavigni, but that in all probability he would spoil it by his embarrassment.

Just as La Rivière was proceeding to answer, however, Chavigni, who had taken his place at the council-table the moment he entered, and had been writing rapidly since, conveyed a slip of paper across to the cardinal, who raised his hand for the usher to be silent while he read. The words which his friend had written greatly discomposed the minister’s plans. They were, “I am afraid it will not succeed: I have seen the queen, when she not only told La Rivière, at once, to command the count, in her name, to answer every question that related to her, but has given him a letter under her own hand to that effect. She is either innocent, or relies devotedly on De Blénau: whichever is the case, her open conduct will clear her in the mind of the king. Act as you like.”

“What is the matter, Monsieur le Cardinal?” demanded Louis, somewhat impatiently. “Why do we not proceed?”

“Because,” answered Richelieu, “what Monsieur de Chavigni says is right, sire, though, I confess, it did not strike me before. Shall we not become contemptible in the eyes of the world, by submitting to be dictated to by Monsieur de Blénau? And is it not a gross insult to your majesty's power, to obey the commands of the queen, when he has refused to obey your own? I am sorry that this did not appear to me earlier; but the objection now seems to me so forcible, that I can proceed no farther in this course."

Louis paused. He looked with as jealous an eye on the possession of any authority by the queen, as Richelieu could wish; but in the present instance he was urged by different motives, in an opposite direction. Some sparks of affection had revived in his bosom towards Anne of Austria, and he wished much to satisfy himself regarding the suspicions which had been urged against her. De Blénau was the dear friend of his favourite Cinq Mars; and his mind also had begun to yield to the arguments of those who sought the destruction of the minister. But, on the other hand, the habit of being ruled by Richelieu, and the specious arguments he produced, made Louis hesitate:—"What, then, do you intend to do?" demanded he, addressing the cardinal.

"In the first place, sire," replied Richelieu, sternly, "I propose to interrogate the prisoner once more, and if his contumacy still continues, let the question be his doom."

The king's naturally good feelings and love of justice, here at once overcame all doubt. "No, God forbid!" cried he, rousing himself to energy. "What, are we Christians, monsieur le cardinal, and shall we put a fellow-creature to the torture, when there is a straight-forward way to gain the information that we want? Fie upon it! No!"

Richelieu's ashy cheek grew still a shade paler. It was the first time for many a year he had undergone rebuke. He felt that the trammels with which he had so long held the king enthralled, were but as green liches twined round the limbs of a giant. He saw that the vast fabric of his power was raised upon a foundation of unsteady sand, and that even then it trembled to its very base.

Louis, in a dignified tone. "What says the queen to the request of our council, that she would command her chamberlain to answer those questions, in regard to which he has a scruple on her account?"

"Her majesty says, sire," answered La Rivière, "that she is most willing to do any thing that will please your majesty; and she has not only ordered me to command, in her name, Monsieur de Blénau to inform the council of every thing he knows concerning her conduct; but has also written this letter with her own hand, to the same effect." And advancing to the table, he bent his knee before the king, and presented the document of which he was the bearer.

Louis took the letter, and read it through. "This looks not like a guilty conscience," said he, frowning upon Richelieu. "Give that to Monsieur de Blénau," he continued to one of the officers. "There, sir count, is your warrant to speak freely; and though we think you carry your sense of honour too far, so as to make it dangerous to yourself, and almost rebellious towards us, we cannot help respecting the principle, even though it be in excess."

"May I always have such a judge as your majesty!" replied De Blénau. "Most humbly do I crave your royal pardon, if I have been at all wanting in duty towards you. Believe me, sire, it has proceeded not from any fault of inclination, but from an error in judgement. I have now no farther hesitation, all my duties being reconciled; and, I believe, the best way fully to reply to the questions which have been asked me, will be by telling your majesty, that I have on several occasions forwarded letters from the queen, by private couriers of my own, or by any other conveyance that offered. None of these letters have been either to the archduke, to Don Francisco de Mello, or any other person whatever, connected with the Spanish government, except her majesty's brother, Philip King of Spain, to whom I have assuredly sent several; but before I ever undertook to do so, her majesty condescended to give me her most positive promise, and to pledge her royal word, that the tidings she gave her brother should on all occasions be confined to domestic affairs, nor even touch upon the external or internal policy of the government, so that my honour and allegiance should be equally unsullied. These letters have sometimes remained upon my person for weeks, waiting for the first opportunity to send them; which circumstance having by some means been discovered, has caused me no small inconvenience at times. Further, I have nothing to tell your majesty, but that I have ever heard the queen express the greatest affection for your royal person and the warmest wishes for your public and private welfare; and, on my honour, I have never observed her do, by word or action, any thing which could be construed into a breach of duty she owes your majesty, either as her sovereign or her husband."

"You see!" exclaimed the king, turning to Richelieu, as De Blénau concluded; "you see—exactly what she confessed herself—not one tittle of difference."

The anger of the cardinal, at finding himself foiled, swept away his political prudence. Irritated and weakened by a wearing disease, he was in no frame of mind to see calmly a scheme he had formed with infinite care, so completely overthrown; and forgetting that the king's energies were now aroused to oppose him, he resolved to let his vengeance fall on the head of De Blénau as the means of his disappointment. His brow darkened, and his eye flashed, and he replied in that stern and haughty manner which had so often carried command along with it.

"If your majesty be satisfied, of course so am I, whose sole wish was to purge the lily crown from the profaning touch of strangers. But as for Monsieur de Blénau, he has confessed himself guilty of a crime little short of high treason, in forwarding those letters to a foreign enemy. We have already condemned a woman to exile for a less offence; and therefore the mildest sentence that the council can pronounce, and which by my voice it does pronounce, is, that Claude Count de Blénau be banished for ever from these realms; and that, if after the space of sixteen days he be found within their precincts, he shall be considered as without the pale of the law, and his blood required at the hand of no man who sheds it!"

There was an indignant spot glowing in the king's face while Richelieu spoke thus, that Chavigni marked with pain; for he saw that the precipitant haste of the minister was hurrying his power to its fall.

"Too much of this!" cried Louis angrily. "Lord cardinal, you forget the presence of the king. Monsieur de Blénau—We, by our royal prerogative, do annul and make void the sentence you have just heard, merely commanding you to retire from this chateau of the Bastille, without holding communication with any persons attached to the court, and to render yourself within the limits of our province of Bourbon, and there to wait our further pleasure. The council is over," he continued, rising. "Monsieur le Cardinal de Richelieu, by sending the warrant for the counts's release sometime in the day to our governor of the Bastille, you will merit our thanks."

The officers cleared the way for the king—the huissiers of the chamber threw wide the doors—and Louis, with a firm and dignified step proceeded slowly out of the hall, followed by Richelieu, who, thunderstruck and confounded, kept his eyes bent upon the ground, in the silence of deep astonishment. The rest of the council, equally mute and surprised, accompanied the cardinal with anxiety in every eye; while the officers of the Bastille and the Count de Blénau remained the sole occupants of the hall of audience.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE silence that reigned in the audience-hall of the Bastille after the scene we have described, endured several minutes, during which each person who remained within its walls, commented mutely on the extraordinary events he had just witnessed. De Blénau's feelings were of course mingled, of surprise at the king's unusual conduct, and gratification at his own deliverance. The governor's thoughts were differently employed, looking forward to the fall of Richelieu, speculating in regard to his successor, and trying to determine who would be the best person to court in the changes that were likely to ensue. "Like master, like man," says the adage; and the inferior officers of the prison, in compliance therewith, calculated upon the removal of the governor as a consequence of the ruin of the minister who had placed him there, and laid their own minor plans for securing their places.

De Blénau was the first to break silence. "Well my friend," said he, addressing the governor, "I am to be your guest no longer, it seems; but be assured that I shall not forget my promises."

"You are infinitely good, monseigneur," answered the other, bowing almost to the ground. "I hope you will believe that I have gone to the very extreme of what my duty permitted, to afford you all convenience."

"I have no doubt of it," replied the count; "but let me ask you what has become of my good friend, Philip the Woodman? He must not be forgotten."

The knowledge of the severity he had exercised towards poor Philip, in the first heat of his anger, now called up a quick flush in the pale cheek of the governor; and he determined to shelter himself from the resentment of his late prisoner, by telling him that the woodman had been liberated.

In those dangerous times, the acuteness of every one was sharpened by continual exercise; and De Blénau's eye, fixing on the varying countenance of his companion, soon detected that there was something amiss, by the alteration which his question produced. "Monsieur le gouverneur," said he, "give me the truth. I promise you that every thing shall be forgotten, provided you have not seriously injured him; but I must know that the man is safe who has served me so faithfully."

"The fact then is this, monseigneur," replied the governor; "thinking it best for all parties, I ordered this Monsieur Philip Grissolles to be confined till after your examination to-day, lest any thing might transpire that could injure you or me."

"You thought of yourself alone, sir," answered De Blénau somewhat bitterly; "but see that he be restored to that degree of liberty which you were ordered at first to permit, or you will hear more of me—"

As he spoke, the door of the audience-hall, communicating with the outer court, was thrown open so suddenly as to make the governor start a pace back, and Chavigni entered the room with a countenance, from which all his efforts could not banish the anxiety of his mind. Naturally quick and impatient, it often happened that his long training in the school of political duplicity did not suffice to overcome the struggles of his original disposition; and even the violent effort to conquer the native earnestness and impatience of his character would sometimes produce more visible marks of its working, than if he had suffered his passions to take their course. In the present instance, his fine features were drawn and sharpened by the attempt to drive from them any expression of his feelings, and his eye flashed with ill-subdued fire, as he irritated himself with a thousand conjectures concerning the latent movers of the recent occurrences. On entering, he pointed his hand towards the door for the governor to leave them; and seeing that he did not immediately obey, he exclaimed in no very placable voice, "Begone! I wish Monsieur de Blénau's company alone.—What do you wait for? Oh, there is the order for his liberation—There take your pack with you." And he pointed to the lower officers of the prison, who thus dismissed, quickly followed the governor as he shrank away from the statesman's hasty and irritable glance.

"Monsieur de Blénau," said Chavigni, as soon as the door was closed, "it was not worth while to detain you here for an hour or two, till such time as the order could be sent for your emancipation; I therefore drew it out in the lodge.—But you owe me nothing for that;" he continued, seeing that De Blénau was about to thank him for the supposed service. "I made it an excuse to stay behind, in order to seek an answer to a question or two. Now, I make no pretence of asking you these questions as a friend, for I know that you consider me not as such; but I do it merely on my own account, wishing for information on some points regarding which, you alone can satisfy me. It is your business, therefore, to consider before you answer, whether so to do, be for your interest or not. The only thing I will promise, which I do honestly, is, not to let your replies go beyond my own breast."

"The method of your address is certainly extraordinary, Monsieur de Chavigni," replied De Blè nau: "but however we may differ on many points, I give you credit for so much frankness, that I believe you would not betray even your enemy if he relied on you: neither do I know, or rather recollect, at this moment, any question I should hesitate to answer. Therefore, propose what you think fit, and I will satisfy you, or not, as suits my convenience."

"Between you and me, Monsieur de Blè nau, there is not need of fine words. I have always found you strictly honourable, and therefore I rely on what you tell me, as if it were within the scope of my own knowledge. In the first place, then, you have been witness to an extraordinary scene to-day.—Are you at all aware from what cause the king has acted as he has done, so at variance with his conduct for fifteen years?"

"Particularly, I am aware of no cause, and can only conjecture that his majesty is tired of being dictated to by his servant?"

"Umph!" said Chavigni, in a tone of dissatisfaction; "there is no need to triumph, Monsieur de Blè nau. Am I to believe that you know of no one who has instigated the king to take such singular steps in your favour?"

"Of none whatever!" answered the count; "unless it were her majesty the queen,—the effect of any application from whom, would be quite different, I should conceive."

"No, no, no!" said Chavigni. "It was not on her that my suspicions rested. I must have been mistaken. One word more.—Have you had any late communication with Monsieur de Cinq Mars?"

About three weeks ago I wrote to him from St. Germain, sending some young hounds for the king's service; but that was long before I dreamed of finding my way hither."

"I must have been mistaken," repeated Chavigni. "I thank you, Monsieur de Blénau. This must be a whim of the king's own—God grant it! for then the humour will soon pass."

"And now, sir," said De Blénau, "that I have answered your questions, there are one or two subjects on which you might give me satisfaction. Are you inclined to do so?"

"If I can, without injuring myself or others, or disclosing any plan that I am desirous to conceal," replied the statesman.

"My questions shall regard the past, and not the future," said De Blénau; "and are intended merely to gratify my own curiosity. In the first place then, I once saw you at St. Germain, in conversation with a demoiselle attached to Mademoiselle de Beaumont—to what did your business with her refer?"

"I did not think you had seen us," replied Chavigni. "I might answer that I was making love, and probably you thought so as well as she did herself; but my conversation referred to you. I found that she had been present when Seguin, the surgeon, brought the news of your having been wounded to the queen: and from her also I learned the words he made use of to let her know that you had not lost the packet which you had upon you in the wood of Mantes."

"Monsieur de Chavigni," said De Blénau, with more cordiality in his manner than he usually evinced towards the statesman; "the world is too well aware of your domestic happiness for any one to suspect you of degrading yourself to a soubrette; I thank you for your candour. Now tell me, is a poor man, called Philip the Woodman, detained here on my account? and why is he so?"

"He is," replied Chavigni, "and the reason is this:—

he happened to recognize amongst those who attacked you a servant of mine, and was fool enough to tell it abroad, so that it reached the king's ears. Now, though every thing is justifiable in the service of the state, I did not particularly wish that business investigated, and I therefore put Monsieur Philip in here to keep him out of the way for a time. You are now of course aware why you were attacked. It was to secure the papers on your person, which papers we supposed were part of a treasonable correspondence between the queen and the Spanish government. All that is now over; and, therefore, if you will promise me not to stir the business of that affair in any way—which indeed would do you no good—this meddling woodman shall have his liberty."

"I never had the slightest intention of stirring it," replied De Blénau; "and therefore rest satisfied on that score. But at the same time I must tell you that the whole affair came to the king's ears through me, and not through the woodman, I believe. I observed your servant, as well as he did, and did not fail to write of it to several of my friends, as well as speak of it openly on more than one occasion; and this, depend upon it, has been the means by which it reached the ears of the king, and not by poor Philip."

"Then I have done him wrong," said Chavigni, "and must make him some amends.—Let me see.—Oh, he shall be sub-lieutenant of the forest; it will just suit him. And now, Monsieur de Blénau, as a friend, let me give you one piece of advice. This country is in a troubled and uncertain state, and there will be, doubtless, many plots and cabals going on. Retire, as you are commanded, into Bourbon; and if any one attempt to lead you into any conspiracy, so far from acceding, do not even listen to them; for the cardinal owes you something for what has happened to-day, and he is not one to forget such debts. The eye of an angry man is upon you!—so be as guarded as if you trod amongst vipers. The time will come when you will say that Chavigni has advised you well."

"And it is certainly advice which I shall follow, both from reason and inclination. But let me ask—am I to consider the king's prohibition strict in regard to communicating with any one at the court?"

Chavigni thought for a moment, and De Blénau imagined that he was considering the circumstances under which Louis's command had been given; but it was not so. The mind of the statesman rapidly reverted to Pauline de Beaumont, all his precautions with regard to whom turned out to be nugatory; and he now calculated the consequences which were likely to ensue under the present state of affairs. He had no fear, indeed, in regard to the responsibility he had taken upon himself; for it would be easy to prove, in case of investigation, that Pauline had attempted in disguise to communicate privately with a state prisoner in the Bastille, which would completely justify the measures he had pursued; but he wished on all accounts to let a matter drop and be forgotten which had already produced such disagreeable events, and he therefore determined boldly to inform Madame De Beaumont of what had been done, and the motives for doing it; and then—certain that for her own sake she would keep silence on the subject—to restore her daughter with all speed.

Though the thoughts of Chavigni were very rapid in combination, yet all these considerations occupied him so long, that De Blénau, perceiving his companion plunged into so profound a reverie, took the liberty of awakening him therefrom by repeating his former question, whether he was to consider the king's prohibition in regard to communicating with the court as strictly to be observed.

"Undoubtedly!" replied Chavigni: "beyond all question! You do not want to get into the Bastille again do you! Oh! I perceive it is Mademoiselle de Beaumont you are thinking of. But you cannot see her. She is neither in Paris, nor at St. Germain; but I will take care that when she joins her mother in Paris, she shall be informed of your safety; and you can write yourself when you get into the Bourbonnois."

The reader, who is behind the scenes, may probably take the trouble of pitying De Blénau for the anxiety he would suffer on hearing that Pauline was neither at St.

Germain nor in Paris ; but there is no occasion to distress himself. De Blénau knowing that Pauline had quitted the court for the purpose of conveying to him the epistle of the queen, naturally concluded that Chavigni had been deceived in regard to her absence, and that she was at all events in safety wherever she was.

In the mean time Chavigni proceeded. " You must of course go to St. Germain, to prepare for your journey ; but stay even there as few hours as you well may. Remember, I have told you, the eye of an angry man is upon you !—to-day is yours, to-morrow may be his—take care that by the least imprudence you do not turn your sunshine into storm. That you may make all speed, I will lend you a horse ; for I own I take some interest in your fate, I know not why, it shall be at the gates in an hour, together with an order for the Woodman's liberation : so now, farewell. I have wasted too much time on you already."

With this speech, half kind, half rude, Chavigni left De Blénau. Whether the statesman's motives were wholly friendly, or whether they might not be partly interested, proceeding from a nice calculation of the precarious state both of the cardinal's health and of his power, weighed with the authority the queen might gain from the failure of either, the count did not stay to investigate, although a suspicion of the latter kind flashed across his mind. In this, however, he did Chavigni injustice. In natural character he was not unlike De Blénau himself, frank, honourable, and generous ; but education is stronger than nature ; and education had made them different beings.

On the departure of the statesman, the count returned once more to the apartment he had occupied while a prisoner, with no small self-gratulation on the change in his situation. Here he busied himself in preparations for his departure, and took pains to ascertain that the paper written by the unhappy Caply still remained in the book, as well as that the file was yet in the position which it described. Having finished this examination, which he looked upon as a duty to the next person destined to inhabit that abode, he waited impatiently till the hour should he passed which Chavigni had named as the time likely to elapse before the horse he promised would be prepared.

Ere it had flown much more than half, however, the governor entered the chamber, and with many profound bows and civil speeches, informed him that Monsieur De Chavigni had sent a horse for his use, and an order for the immediate liberation of Philip the woodman. De Blénau was gratified by Chavigni's prompt fulfilment of his word in this last respect; and remembering the thousand crowns which he had promised the governor on his liberation, he placed them in his hands, which brought him very near to the end of the large sum of gold that his valise contained.

Now De Blénau was perfectly well convinced that the governor was as great a rogue as need be: but there is something so expansive in the idea of being liberated from prison, that he could not bear the thought of keeping his louis shut up in a bag any longer, and he poured them forth into the governor's palm with as much satisfaction as if he was emancipating so many prisoners himself.

An écu courant was worth, in that day, about three francs, and a louis d'or somewhere about four-and-twenty (more or less, according to the depreciation), so that eight ecus, or crowns went to the louis; and, consequently, the sum of one thousand crowns amounted very nearly to one hundred and twenty-five golden louis, which was a very pretty reward for a rogue to receive for being a rascal in a good cause: nevertheless, the governor, even when he had safely clutched the promised fee, looked very wistfully at a little green silk bag, which De Blénau reserved in his left hand, and which he calculated must contain about the same sum, or more.

The count, however, held it firm; and having given directions to whom, and when, his baggage was to be delivered, he descended into the inner court, and cast his eyes round in search of his faithful friend Philip. But the woodman had received at once his emancipation from the dungeon where we last left him, and the news that De Blénau was free; and though he lingered in the court to see the young count depart, with something both of joy and pride in his feelings, yet there was a sort of timid delicacy in the peasant's mind, which made him draw back from observation, amidst the crowd of prisoners that the court now contained, the moment that he perceived the governor, with many a servile cringe, marshalling the late prisoner towards the gate of the Bastille ; while those less fortunate persons, still destined to linger out their time within its curious walls, stood off with envying looks, to allow a passage for him, now freed from their sad fellowship. De Blénau, however, was by no means forgetful of the woodman, and not perceiving him amongst the rest, he inquired where he was, of the obsequious governor, who instantly vociferated his name till the old arches echoed with the sound. " Philip ! Philip the woodman ! Philip Grissolles !" cried the governor.

" Does he know that he is free altogether to return home ?" demanded De Blénau seeing him approach.

" No, I believe not," replied the governor. " I had the honour of waiting first upon your lordship.

Philip now came near, and De Blénau had the gratification of announcing to him, unforestalled, that the storm had blown over, and that he might now return to his cottage in peace. He also told him of the appointment with which Chavigni proposed to compensate his imprisonment, an office so elevated, that the gayest day-dreams of Philip's ambition had never soared to half its height. But the joy of returning to the bosom of his family, to the calm shelter of his native forest, and the even tenor of his daily toil, swallowed up all his feelings. A throne would not have made him happier ; and the tears of delight streaming down his rough cheek, brought a glistening drop too into De Blénau's eye. Noble and aristocratic as he was, De Blénau felt that there was an aristocracy above all—the nobility of virtue ; and he did not disdain to grasp the broad hand of the honest woodman. " Fare you well, Philip," he said. " Fare you well, till we meet again. I shall not easily forget you."

The woodman felt something more weighty in his palm than the hand of De Blénau, and looked at the heavy green purse which remained in it with a hesitating glance. But the count raised his finger to his lip with a smile. "Not a word," said he, "not a word, as you value my friendship." And turning round, he followed the governor through the various passages to the outer court, where stood Chavigni's horse caparisoned for his journey. De Blè nau sprang into the saddle with the lightness of recovered freedom. The heavy gate was thrown open, the drawbridge fell, and, striking the sides of his horse with his armed heel, the newly emancipated prisoner bounded over the clattering boards of the pontlevé, and with a lightened heart took the road to St. Germain.

His journey was soon made, and, as he approached the place of his destination, all the well-known objects round about seemed as if there shone upon them now a brighter and more beautifying sun than when he last beheld them. At his hotel all was gladness and delight, and crowding round their loved Lord, with smiles of welcome, his attendants could scarcely be made to comprehend that he was again about to quit St. Germain. De Blè nau's commands, however, immediately to prepare for a long journey, recalled them to their duty; and eager to accompany him wherever he went, their arrangements were soon completed, and the majordomo announced that all were ready.

Not so the count himself, who, notwithstanding the king's command, could not resolve to quit St. Germain without visiting the palace. Sending forward, therefore, his train to the entrance of the forest, he proceeded on foot to the gate of the park, and crossing the terrace, entered the chateau by the small door in the western quadrangle.

Perhaps De Blè nau was not without a hope that Pauline might have returned thither from Paris; and at first, meeting none of the royal servants, he walked from empty chamber to chamber, with a degree of undefined expectation that in each he should find the object of his wishes: but of course his search was in vain, and descending to the lower part of the building, he proceeded to the porter's chamber, who, having received no news to the contrary, informed him that the whole court were still at Chantilly.

I know not why it is, but somehow the heart, by long association with particular objects, forms as it were a friendship even with things inanimate, when they have been the silent witnesses of our hopes or our happiness; they form a link between us and past enjoyment, a sort of landmark for memory to guide us back to happy recollections; and to quit them, like every other sort of parting has no small degree of pain. We are apt, too, to calculate all that may happen before we see them again, and the knowledge of the innumerable multitude of human miseries, from amongst which fortune may choose, gives generally to such anticipations a gloomy hue. Looking back upon the towers of St. Germain, De Blénau felt as if he were parting from Pauline, and parting from her for a long and indefinite time; and his heart sickened in spite of all the gay dreams to which his liberation had at first given birth.

Who is there that even when futurity is decked in the brightest colours which probability can lend to hope—when youth, and health, and ardent imagination combine to guarantee all the promises of life—who is there, that even then does not feel the painful influence of parting from any thing that is loved? Who is there in the world, the summer of whose bosom is so eternal, that at such moments, dark imaginings will not cloud the warmest sunshine of their heart, and cast a gloomy uncertain shadow on the most glowing scenes expectation can display? Not so De Blénau. Fancy presented to his mind a thousand forebodings of evil, as with many a lingering look he turned again and again towards the palace; and even when at length he was joined by his train, who waited at the entrance of the forest, he was still absorbed in gloomy meditations. However, he felt it was in vain, and springing on his horse, he turned his face, resolutely on his onward way,

Skirting along the wood, he soon reached Versailles, and thence proceeding with little intermission, he arrived in time to pass the night at Etampes, from which place he set out early the next morning for Orleans. Continuing to trace along the course of the Loire with quick stages, he soon arrived at Nevets, where he crossed the river, and shortly after entered the Bourbonnois.

CHAPTER XXVII.

I KNOW I am very wrong, very partial, and very inconsiderate, to give two consecutive chapters to the Count de Blénau, when I have more people to despatch than had Captain Bobadil in the play, and less time to do it in. But I could not help it; those two last chapters would go together, and they were too long to be clapped up into one pat, as I have seen Sarah the dairy-maid do with the stray lumps of butter that float about in the butter-milk, after the rest of the churn's produce has been otherwise disposed of. So I am very sorry, and so forth.—And now, if you please, my dear reader, we will go on to some one else. What would you think of the Norman?—Very well!—For my part, I look upon him as the true hero of the story; for according to the best accounts, he ~~was~~ more, drank more, lied more, and fought more than any one else, and was a great rogue into the bargain; all which, in the opinion of Homer, is requisite to the character of a hero. See the Odyssey passim.

At Troyes, the Norman's perquisitions were very successful. No Bow-street officer could have detected all the proceedings of Fontrailles with more acuteness. Step by step he traced him, from his first arrival at Troyes, till the day he set out for Mesnil St. Loup; and learning the road he had taken, he determined upon following the same track, for he shrewdly concluded, that whatever business of import the conspirator had been engaged in, had been transacted in the two days and one night, which, according to the story of the garçon d'auberge at the Hôtel du Grand Soleil, he had been absent from the good city of Troyes.

Now, our friend Monsieur Marteville had learned another piece of news, which made him the more willing to bend his steps in the direction pointed out as that which Fontrailles had taken. This was no other than that a considerable band of robbers had lately come down into that part of the country to collect their rents; and that their principal haunt was supposed to be the thick woods which lay on the borders of the high road to Troyes, in the neighbourhood of Mesnil.

True it is, the Norman had abandoned his free companions of the forest, and received the wages of Monsieur de Chavigni; but still he kept up a kind of desultory correspondence with his former associates, and had not lost sight of them till certain reports got about, that the Lieutenant Criminel was going to visit the forest of Layc, which induced them to leave the vicinity of St. Germain, for fear that there should not be room enough in the forest for them and the Lieutenant too. It was natural enough that Marteville should wish to make a morning call upon his old friends: besides—I'll tell you a story. There was once upon a time a man who had a cat, of which he was so fond, that, understanding one Mr. Pigmalion had got an ivory statue changed into a wife by just asking it, he resolved to see what he could do for his cat in the same way. But I dare say you know the story just as well as I do—how the cat was changed into a woman, and how she jumped out of bed after a mouse, and so forth; showing plainly, that “what is bred in the bone will never go out of the flesh;” that “nature is better than a school-master;” and that “you can never make a silk purse out of a sow's ear;”—as Sancho would say. However, the Norman had a strange hankering after his good old trade, and was very well inclined to pass a day or two in the free forest, and do Chavigni's work into the bargain. There was a little embarras indeed in the case, respecting Louise, for whom, in these first days of possession, he did feel a certain degree of attachment; and did not choose to leave her behind, though he did not like to take her with him, considering the society he was going to meet. “Pshaw!” said he at length, speaking to himself, ‘I'll leave her at Mesnil.’

This resolution he began to put in execution, by placing Louise upon one horse, and himself upon the other, together with their several valises; and thus in the same state and order in which they had arrived at Troyes, so they quitted it for Mesnil St. Loup. All the information that Marteville possessed to guide him in his further inquiries, amounted to no more than this, (which he learned from the aforesaid garçon d'auberge;) namely, that the little gentleman in gray had taken the road apparently to Mesnil; that he had been absent, as before said, two days and one night; and that his horse, when it came home appeared to have been furnished with a new shoe en route. This, however, was quite sufficient as a clue, and the Norman did not fail to turn it to its full account.

Passing through the little villages of Mehun and Langly, the Norman eyed every Blacksmith's forge as he went; but the one was next to the post-house, and the other was opposite the inn; and the Norman went on, saying within himself—"A man who was seeking concealment, would rather proceed with his beast unshod than stop there." So, resuming his conversation with Louise, they jogged on, babbling, not of green fields, but of love and war; both of which subjects were much within the knowledge of the Sieur Marteville, his battles being somewhat more numerous than his wives, and having had plenty of both in his day.

At all events, Louise was very well satisfied with the husband that heaven had sent her, and looked upon him as a very fine gentleman, and a great warrior; and though, now and then, she would play the coquette a little, and put forth all the little minauderie which a Languedoc soubrette could assume, in order to prevent the Norman from having too great a superiority, yet Monsieur Marteville was better satisfied with her than any of his former wives; and as she rode beside him, he admired her horsemanship, and looked at her from top to toe in much the same manner that he would have examined the points of a fine Norman charger. No matter how Louise was mounted: suffice it to say, that it was not on a side saddle, such things being but little known at the time I speak of.

While they were thus shortening the road with sweet discourse, at the door of a little hovel by the side of the highway, half hidden, from sight by a clumsy mud wall against which he leaned, half exposed by the lolloping position he assumed, appeared the large, dirty, unmeaning face and begrimed person of a Champenois blacksmith, with one hand grubbing amongst the roots of his grizzled hair, and the other hanging listlessly by his side, loaded with the ponderous hammer appropriated to his trade. "C'est ici," thought the Norman, "Quatre vingt dix neuf moutons et un Champenois font cent—Ninety-nine sheep and a Champenois make a hundred; and so we'll see what my fool will tell me.—Holla! Monsieur!"

"Plait-il?" cried the Champenois, advancing from his hut.

"Pray has Monsieur Pont Orson passed here to-day?" demanded the Norman.

"Monsieur Pont Orson! Monsieur Pont Orson!" cried the Champenois, trying to assume an air of thought, and rummaging in his empty head for a name that never was in it: "Pardie, I do not know."

"I mean," said the Norman, "the same little gentleman in gray, who stopped here ten days ago, to have a bay horse shod, as he was coming back from—what's the name of the place?"

"No!" cried the Champenois; "he was going, he was not coming, when he had his horse shod."

"But I say he was coming," replied the Norman. "How the devil do you know he was going?"

"Mais dame!" exclaimed the other; "how do I know he was going? Why, did not he ask me how far it was to Mesnil? and if he had not been going, why should he wish to know?"

"It was not he, then," said the Norman.

"Mais dame! ouai!" cried the Champenois. "He was dressed all in gray, and had a bay horse, on whose hoof I put as nice a piece of iron as ever came off an anvi ; and he asked me how far it was to Mesnil, and whereabouts was the old castle of St. Loup. 'Monsieur Pont Orson ! Monsieur Pont Orson ? Dieu ! qui aurait deviné que c'étoit Monsieur Pont Orson !' "

"Mais je vous dis que ce n'étoit pas lui," cried the Norman, putting spurs to his horse. "Allons, chérie. Adieu, Monsieur Champenois, adieu !—Ha ! ha ! ha !" cried he, when at a little distance. "Ganache ! he has told me all that I wanted to know. Then he did go to Mesnil—the old chateau of St. Loup ! What could he want there ? I've heard of this old chateau."

"But who is Monsieur Pont Orson ?" demanded Louise interrupting the broken cogitations of her husband.

"Nay, I know not, ma chère," replied her husband "The man in the moon, with a corcscrew to tap yon fool's brains, and draw out all I wanted to know about the person whom I told you I was seeking for Monsieur de Chavigni—It was a mere name. But there, I see a steeple on yon hill in the wood. Courage ! we shall soon reach it. It is not above a league.—That must be Mesnil."

The Norman's league, however, proved at least two, and Louise, though a good horsewoman, was complaining most bitterly of fatigue, when they arrived in the little street of Mesnil St. Loup, and, riding up to the dwelling of our old friend Gaultier the innkeeper, alighted under the withered garland that hung over the door.

"Holla ! Aubergiste ! Garçon !" cried the Norman, "Holla !"

But no one came ; and on repeating the summons, the sweet voice of the dame of the house was all that could be heard, screaming forth a variety of tender epithets, applicable to the garçon d'écurie, and intended to stimulate him to come forth and take charge of the strangers' horses. "Don't you know, Lambin," cried she, "that that hog your master is lying up-stairs dying for no one knows what ? and am I to go out, Maraud, and take people's horses with my hands all over grease, while you stand l—s—ng yourself there ? Cochon ! if you do not go, I'll throw this pot-lid at you." And immediately a tremendous rattle on the boards at the farther side of the stable, announced that she had been as good as her word.

This seemed the only effectual method of arousing the occult sensibilities of the garçon d'écurie, who listened unconcerned to her gentler solicitations, but, yielding to the more potent application of the pot-lid, came forth and took the bridle of the horses, while our Norman lifted his lady to the ground.

The sight of such goodly limbs as those possessed by Monsieur Marteville, but more especially the blue velvet pourpoint to which we have formerly alluded, and which he wore on the present occasion, did not fail to produce the most favourable impression on the mind of the landlady; and, bustling about with the activity of a grasshopper, she prepared to serve the athletic cavalier and his pretty lady to the best cheer of the auberge.

"Would madame choose some stewed escargots pour se restaurer? Would monsieur take un coup de vin before dinner, to wash the dust out of his mouth? Would madame step up stairs to repose herself? Would monsieur take a gouter?" These and a thousand other civil proffers the hostess showered upon the Norman and Louise, some of which were accepted, some declined; but the principal thing on which the Norman seemed to set his heart was the speedy preparation of dinner, which he ordered with the true galloping profusion of a beggar on horseback, demanding the best of every thing. While this was in progress, he forgot not the principal object of his journey, but began with some circumlocution to draw the hostess towards the subject of Foutrailles' visit to Mesnil.

At the very mention, however, of a little man in gray, the good landlady burst forth in such a torrent of invective that she went well nigh to exhaust her copious vocabulary of epithets and expletives; while the Norman, taken by surprise, stood gazing and shrugging his shoulders, wondering at her facility of utterance, and the vast rapidity with which she concatenated her hard names. The little man in gray, who had been there precisely ten days before, was, according to her opinion, a liar, and a rogue, and a cheat ; a conjurer, a Huguenot, and a vagabond ; a man without honour, principle, or faith ; a maraud, a matin, a misérable ; together with a great many other titles, the enumeration of which she summed up with "et s'il n'est pas le Diable, le Diable l'emporte !"

"C'est vrai," cried the Norman every time she paused to take breath ; "C'est vrai. But how came you to find out he was so wicked ?"

The lady's reply was not of the most direct kind ; but from it the Norman gathered, with his usual acuteness, that after our friend Gaultier had pointed out to Fontrailles the road to the old castle of St. Loup, he returned home, his mind oppressed with the consciousness of being the confidant of a sorcerer. He laboured under the load of this terrific secret for some days ; and then, his constitution not being able to support his mental struggles, he sickened and took to his bed, where he still lay in a deplorable state, talking in his sleep of the conjurer in gray, and of Père le Rouge, and the devil himself, and sundry other respectable people of the same class. But when awake, it must be remarked, the aubergiste never opened his lips upon the subject, notwithstanding all the solicitations which his better half, being tempted by the curiosity of her sex, did not fail to make. From all this the good dame concluded that the little man in gray had bewitched her husband and driven him mad, causing him to lie up there upon his bed like a hog, neglecting his business, and leaving her worse than a widow.

All this was corn, wine, and oil to the mind of the Norman, who, wisely reserving his opinion on the subject, retired to consult with Louise, having a great esteem for woman's wit in such cases. After some discussion, a plan was manufactured between them, which, though somewhat bold in conception, was happily brought to issue in the following manner.

During the dinner, at which the bourgeoise waited herself, she was not a little surprised to hear Louise more than once call Marteville by the reverend appellation of mon père ; and if this astonished, how much was her wonder increased when afterwards, during a concerted absence of the Norman, the fair lady informed her, under a promise of profound secrecy, that the goodly cavalier, whose blue velvet doublet she had so much admired, was neither more nor less than the celebrated Père Alexis, directeur of the Jesuits of Alençon, who was travelling in disguise in order to place her (one of his penitents) in a monastery at Rome.

True, Louise either forgot or did not know that they were not precisely in the most direct road to Rome, but she was very safe in the person she spoke to, who had even less knowledge of where Rome stood than herself. Now the story of Louise was a very probable one in every other respect, considering the manners of the day; for les bons pères Jesuites very often travelled about in disguise for purposes best known to themselves, and very few of the bons pères, whether Jesuits or not, were averse to a fair penitent. Be that as it may, the simple bourgeoise never doubted it for a moment; and casting herself at the feet of Louise, she entreated her, with tears in her eyes, to intercede with the reverend directeur to confess and absolve her sinful husband, who lay up-stairs like a hog, doing nothing.

Just at this moment the Norman re-entered the room; and though his precise object,* in the little drama they had got up, was neither more nor less than to confess the unhappy aubergiste, yet, as a matter of form, he made some difficulty to meddling with the penitent of another; but after faintly advising that the curé of the village should be sent for, he agreed, as the case was urgent, to undertake the office of confessor himself, though he mildly reproached Louise, in the presence of the hostess, for having betrayed his real character, and bade her be more careful in future.

As soon as he had signified his consent, the bourgeoise ran to tell her husband that the very reverend Père Alexis, directeur of the Jesuits of Alençon, had kindly consented to hear his confession and absolve him of his sins; and in the mean while the Norman gave directions to Louise, whose adroitness had often served him in discovering the secrets of the palace, while she had remained with Madame de Beaumont, to gain in the present instance, all the information she could from the wife, while he went to interrogate the husband.

This being settled, as a blue velvet pourpoint was not exactly the garb to play a confessor in, Louise ran in all haste to strip the astrologer's robe we have already mentioned of all its profane symbols, and the Norman, casting its shadowy folds over his lusty limbs, and drawing the hood over his head, appeared to the eye as goodly a friar as ever cracked a bottle. No great regard to costume was necessary, for the land lady took it all for granted; and when she beheld the Norman issue forth from the room in which the valise had been placed, clothed in his long dark robes, she cast herself at his feet in a transport of reverence and piety.

Monsieur Marteville, otherwise the Père Alexis, did not fail to give her his blessing with great gravity, and with a solemn demeanour and slow step followed to the chamber of the sick man.

Poor Gaultier was no longer the gay rosy cheeked inn-keeper which he had appeared to Fontrailles, but stretched upon his bed, he lay pale and wan, muttering over to himself shreds and tatters of prayers, and thinking of the little man in gray, Père le Rouge, and the devil. As soon as he beheld the pretended Père Alexis enter his chamber, he essayed to rise in his bed; but the Norman motioned him to be still, and sitting down by him, exhorted him to make a full confession of his sins; and then, to give greater authenticity to his character, he knelt down and composed an extempore prayer, in a language equally of his own manufacture, but which the poor aubergiste believed devoutly to be Latin, hearing every now and then the words sanctissimus, in secula seculorum, and benedictus, with which the Norman did not fail to season it richly being the only stray Latin he was possessed of.

"Humgunnibus quintessentialiter expositu dum dum; benedictus sint foolatii et sanctissimus fourbi. Hi sty Aubergisti rorum coram nobis excipe capones pourlardici geueri, fur grataverunt pectus, legbonibus venzon in secula seculorum sanctissimus benedictus," said the Norman

"Amen!" cried the innkeeper from the bottom of his heart, with such fervency that the Père Alexis could scarcely maintain his gravity.

The Norman now proceeded to business, and putting down his ear to a level with the lips of Gaultier, he once more desired him to make a clear breast.

"Oh, mon père," cried Gaultier, "Je suis un pauvre pécheur, un misérable !"

The good father exhorted him to take courage, and to come to a detail of his crimes.

"Oh mon père," cried he, "I have sold cats for rabbits, and more especially for hares. I have moistened an old hareskin with warm water and bloodied it with chicken's blood, to make my cats and my badgers and my weasels pass for what they really were not. I have cooked up snakes for eels, and dressed vipers en matelot. I have sold bad wine of Bois-marly for good wine of Epernay; and Oh mon père, je suis un pauvre pécheur."

"Well, well, get on," cried the Norman, somewhat impatiently, "I'll give you absolution for all that. All innkeepers do the same. But what more have you done?"

"Oh mon père, je suis un pauvre pécheur," proceeded Gaultier in a low voice: "I have charged my customers twice as much as I ought to charge. I have vowed that fish was dear when it was cheap; and I have—"

"Nom de Dieu !" cried the Norman getting out of temper with the recapitulation of Gaultier's peccadilloes. "Nom de Dieu ! that is to say, in the name of God. I absolve you from all such sins as are common to innkeepers, masters of taverns, cooks, aubergistes, and the like—sins of profession as they may be called—only appointing you to kneel before the altar of your parish church for two complete hours, repeating the Pater and the Ave during the whole time, by way of penance;" thought he, for making me hear all this nonsense.—"But come," he continued, "bring up the heavy artillery—that is, let me hear your more uncommon sins. You have some worse things upon your conscience than any you have told, or I am mistaken."

"Oh, mon père ! Oh, mon bon père !" groaned Gaultier. "Je suis un pauvre pécheur, un misérable."

"Now it comes," thought the Norman; "Allons, allons, mon fils, ayez courage ! l'Eglise est pleine de miséri corde."

"There was an old owl in the barn," said Gaultier, "and woodcocks being scarce—"

"Ventre Saint Gris !" cried Marteville to himself, "this will never come to an end. Mais, mon fils," he said aloud, "I have told you all that is pardoned. Speak, can you charge yourself with murder, treason, conspiracy, sorcery," — Gaultier groaned — "astrology" — Gaultier groaned still more deeply — "or of having concealed any such crimes, when committed by others?" Gaultier groaned a third time. The Norman had now brought him to the point; and after much moaning, hesitation, and agony of mind, he acknowledged that he had been privy to a meeting of sorcerers. — Nay, that he had even conducted a notorious astrologer, a little man in gray, on the road to meet the defunct Père le Rouge and his companion the devil, at the old chateau of St. Loup; and that it was his remorse of conscience for this crime, together with his terror at revealing it, after the menaces of the sorcerer, that had thrown him into the lamentable state in which he then lay.

By degrees, the Norman drew from him every particular and treasuring them up in his memory, he hastened to give the suffering inkeeper absolution; which, though not performed in the most orthodox manner, quite satisfied Gaultier; who concluded, that any little difference of form from that to which he had been used, proceeded from the Norman being a Jesuit and a directeur; and he afterwards was heard to declare, that the Père Alexis was the most pious and saintly of men, and that one absolution from him was worth a hundred from any one else; although the curé of the village, when he heard the method in which it had been administered, pronounced it to be heretodox and heretical, and in short a damnable error.

And here he it remarked, that a neighbouring curé

having taken up the quarrel of Père Alexis, and pronounced his form to be the right one, a violent controversy ensued, which raged in Champagne for more than fifty years, producing nine hundred pamphlets, three thousand letters, twenty public discussions, and four Papal bulls, till at length it was agreed on for all hands to write to the Jesuits of Alençon, and demand their authority for such a deviation from established rules: when it was discovered that they had administered absolution like every one else; and that they never had such a person as Père Alexis belonging to their very respectable and learned body.

But to return to the Norman. As soon as he had concluded all the ceremonies he thought right to perform, for the farther consolation of Gaultier, he said to him—"Fear not, my son, the menaces of the sorcerer; for I forbid all evil beings, even were it the devil himself, to lay so much as the tip of a finger upon you; and moreover I will go this very night to the old chateau of St. Loup, and will exorcise Père le Rouge and drive his spirit forth from the place, and, morbleu! if he dare appear to me I will take him by the beard, and lead him into the middle of the village, and all the little children shall drum him out of the regiment—I mean out of the town."

With this bold resolution, Monsieur Marteville descended to the ground-floor, and communicated his design to Louise and the bourgeoise, who were sitting with their noses together over a flagon of vin chaud. "Donnez moi un coup de vin," said he, "et j'irai."

But Louise, who did not choose to trust her new husband out of her sight, having discovered by a kind of instinct, that in his case "absence was worse than death," declared she would go with him, and see him take Père Le Rouge by the beard. The Norman remonstrated, but Louise persisted with a sort of sweet pertinacity which was quite irresistible, and, though somewhat out of humour with her obstinacy, he was obliged to consent.

However, he growled audibly while she assisted to dis-embarrass him of his long black robe; and probably had it not been for his assumed character, would have accompanied his opposition with more than one of those elegant expletives with which he was wont to season his discourse. Louise, notwithstanding all this, still maintained her point, and the horses being brought forth, the bags were placed on their backs, and the Norman and his spouse set forth for the old chateau of St. Loup, taking care to repeat their injunction to the landlady not to discover their real characters to any one, as the business of the Père directeur required the utmost secrecy.

The landlady promised devoutly to comply, and having seen her guests depart, entered the public room, where several of the peasantry had by this time assembled, and told every one in a whisper that the tall gentleman they had seen get on horseback was the Père Alexis directeur of the Jesuits of Alençon, and that the lady was Mademoiselle Louise de Crackmagnole, sa pénitente. Immediately, they all ran in different directions, some to the door, some to the window, to see so wonderful a pair as the Père Alexis and his pénitente. The bustle, rushing, and chattering which succeeded, and which the landlady could no way abate, called the attention of the Sieur Marteville, who, not particularly in a good humour at being contradicted by Louise, was so much excited into anger by the gaping of the multitude, that he had well nigh drawn the portentous Toledo which hung by his side, and returned to satisfy their curiosity by presenting his person rather nearer than they might have deemed agreeable. He bridled in his wrath, however, or rather to change the figure, kept it in store for some future occasion; and consoling himself with a few internal curses, in which Louise had her share, he rode on, and soon arrived at that part of the wood which we have already said was named the Sorcerer's Grove.

Of the unheard of adventures which there befel, the giants that he slew, and the monsters that he overcame, we shall treat in a future chapter, turning our attention at present to other important subjects which call loudly for detail.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

"GREAT news! Cinq Mars!" exclaimed Fontrailles. 'Great news! the Cardinal is sick to the death, and goes without loss of time to Tarascon: he trembles upon the brink of the grave.'

Cinq Mars was stretched upon three chairs, the farthest of which he kept balanced on its edge by the weight of his feet, idly rocking it backwards and forwards, while his mind was deeply buried in one of the weak romances of the day, the reading which was a favourite amusement with the Master of the Horse, at those periods when the energies of his mind seemed to sleep. "Too good news to be true, Fontrailles," he replied, hardly looking up, "take my word for it, the devil never dies."

"That may be," answered Fontrailles. "but nevertheless the cardinal, as I said, is dying, and goes instantly to Tarascon to try another climate."

"Why, where hast thou heard all this? and when didst thou come from Spain?" demanded Cinq Mars, rousing himself. "Thou hast made good speed."

"Had I not good reason?" asked the other. "But they tell me that I must question you for news; for that it is something in regard to your friend, the young Count De Blénau, which has so deeply struck the Cardinal."

"Well then, I will give the story in true heroic style," answered Cinq Mars, tossing the book from him. "Thou dost remember, O my friend!" he continued, imitating the language of the romance he had just been reading, "how stormy was the night, when last I parted from thee at the old chateau of Mesnil St. Loup; and if the thunder clouds passed away, and left the sky clear and moonlighted, it was but to be succeeded by a still more violent tempest. For, long after thou wert snugly housed in Troyes, De Thou and myself were galloping on through the storm of night. The rain fell, the lightning glanced, the thunder rolled over head, and the way seemed doubly long, and the forest doubly dreary, when by a sudden blaze of the red fire of heaven, I descried some one, mounted on a white horse, come rapidly towards us."

"Come, come, Cinq Mars!" exclaimed Fontrailles, "for grace, leave the land of romance—remember I have a long story to tell, and not much time to tell it in. Truce with imagination, therefore, for we have more serious work before us."

"It's truth—it's truth, I speak, thou unbelieving Jew," cried Cinq Mars. "No romance, I can assure you. Well, soon as this white horseman saw two others wending their way towards him, he suddenly reined in his beast, and turning round, galloped off as hard as he could go. Now, if curiosity be a failing, it is one I possess in an eminent degree; so, clapping spurs to my horse, after him I went, full faster than he ran away. As for De Thou, he calls out after me, loud enough to drown the thunder, crying, 'Cinq Mars, where are you going? In God's name stop—We know the place is full of banditti—If these are robbers, they may murder you,'—and so on; but finding that I did not much heed, he also was smitten with a galloping fit, and so we followed each other like a procession, though with no procession pace: the white horseman first—I next—and De Thou last—with about a hundred yards between each of us—going all at full speed, to the great peril of our necks, and no small danger of our heads from the boughs. I was best mounted however, on my stout black horse Sloeberry—you know Sloeberry;—and so distancing De Thou all to nothing, I began to come closer to my white horseman, who, finding that he could not get off, gradually pulled in, and let me come up with him. 'Well, sir,' said he directly, with all possible coolness—'you have ridden hard to-night.'—'In truth, I have, my man,' answered I, 'and so have you, and I should much like to know why you did so.'—'For the same reason that you did, I suppose,' replied the boy, for such it was who spoke.—'And what reason is that?' I asked.—'Because we both liked it, I suppose,' replied he.—'That may be,' answered I; 'but we have all a reason for our likings.'—'True, sir,' said the boy, 'and I dare say yours was a good one; pray, believe that mine was so also.—All the time he spoke, he kept looking round at me, till at last he got a good sight of my face. ‘Are not you Monsieur de Cinq Mars?’ cried he at length.—‘And if I am, what follows then?’—‘Why it follows that you are the person I want,’ said the boy.—‘And what want you with me?’—‘Who is that?’ demanded he, pointing to De Thou, who now came up. I soon satisfied him on that score, and he went on. ‘My name is Henry de la Mothe, and I am page to your good friend, the Count de Blèneau, whom I have seen arrested and carried to the Bastille.’

“Now, you know, Fontrailles, how dear I hold De Blèneau; so you may guess how pleasantly this rang upon my ear. My first question to the page was, whether my friend had sent him to me. ‘No, no, seigneur,’ answered the boy; ‘but as I knew you loved my master, and the king loved you, I thought it best to let you know, in case you might wish to serve him. He was taken as he was about to go with the queen to Chantilly, and they would not let me or any other go with him, to serve him in prison. So I cast about in my mind, how I could serve him out of it, and consequently came off to seek you.’—‘But how did you know where to find me?’ demanded I, not a little fearing that our movements were watched; but the boy relieved me from that by answering, ‘Why, sir, there was a messenger came over from Chantilly to desire the queen’s presence; and amongst all the questions I asked him, there was one which made him tell me that you had gone to Troyes upon some business of inheritance, and as I heard that the path through this wood would save me a league, I took it, hoping to reach the town to-night.’

“Well, all the page’s news vexed me not a little, and I thought of a thousand things to relieve De Blèneau ere I could fix on any. But it happened, as it often does in this world, that chance directed me when reasoning failed. Having made the best of my way, I arrived with De Thou and the boy at Chantilly at the hour of nine the next night, and passing towards my own apartments in the palace, I saw the king’s cabinet open, and on inquiry, found that he had not yet retired to rest. My resolution was instantly taken; and without waiting even to dust my boots, I went just as I was, to pay my duty to his majesty. My short absence had done me no harm with Louis, who received me with more grace than ever; so while the newness was on, I dashed at the subject next my heart at once. Like a well-bred falcon, I soared my full pitch, hovered an instant in my pride of place, and then stooped at once with irresistible force. In short, Fontrailles, for the first time I believe in my life, I boasted. I told Louis how I loved him; I counted over the services I had done him. His noble heart—you may smile, sir, but he has a noble heart—was touched; I saw it, and gave him a moment to think over all old passages of affection between us, and to combine them with the feelings of the moment, and then I told him that my friend—my bosom friend—was suffering from the tyranny of the cardinal, and demanded his favour for De Blénau. ‘What can I do, Cinq Mars?’ demanded he, ‘you know I must follow the advice of my ministers and counsellors.’

“It was an opportunity not to be lost,” exclaimed Fontrailles, eagerly; “I hope you seized it.”—“I did,” replied Cinq Mars. “I plied him hard on every point that could shake the influence of Richelieu. I showed him the shameful bondage he suffered. I told him, that if he allowed the sovereign power, placed by God in his hands, to be abused by another, he was as guilty as if he misused it himself; and then I said—‘I plead alone for the innocent, sire. Hear De Blénau yourself, and if you find him guilty, bring him to the block at once. But if he have done nothing worthy of death, I will trust that your majesty’s justice will instantly set him free.’ Well, the king not only promised that he would go to Paris and examine De Blénau himself, but he added—‘And I will be firm, Cinq Mars; I know the power is in my own hands, and I will exert it to save your friend, if he be not criminal.’”

“This was all fair, Fontrailles; I could desire no more; but Louis even outdid my expectation. Something had already irritated him against the cardinal—I think it was the banishment of Clara de Hauteford. However, he went to the Bastille with Richelieu, Chavigni, and others of the council. Of course I was not admitted; but I heard all that passed from one who was present. De Blénau bore him nobly and bravely, and downright refused to answer any questions about the queen, without her majesty's own commands. Well; Richelieu, according to custom, was for giving him the torture instantly. But the king had many good reasons for not suffering that to be done. Besides wishing to pleasure me, and being naturally averse to cruelty, he had a lingering inclination to cross Richelieu, and De Blénau's firmness set him a good example: so the cardinal was overruled; and the queen's commands to De Blénau to confess all being easily procured, he owned that he had forwarded letters from her majesty to her brother the King of Spain. Now, you see, Richelieu was angry, and irritated at being thwarted; and he did the most foolish thing that man ever did; for though he saw that Louis was roused, and just in the humour to cross him, he got up, and not considering the king's presence, at once pronounced a sentence of exile against De Blénau, as if the sovereign power had been entirely his own, without consulting Louis, or asking his approbation at all. Though, God knows, the king cares little enough about using his power, of course he does not like to be treated as a mere cipher before his own council; and accordingly he revoked the cardinal's sentence without hesitation, sending De Blénau, merely for form's sake, into Bourbon; and then rising, he broke up the council, treating Richelieu with as scanty consideration as he had shown himself. By Heaven! Fontrailles, when I heard it, I could have played the fool for joy. Richelieu was deeply touched, you may suppose; and what with his former ill health and this new blow, he has never been himself since; but I knew not that he was so far gone as you describe."

"It is so reported in Paris," replied Fontrailles; "and he has become so humble that no one would know him. But mark me, Cinq Mars. The cardinal is now upon the brink of a precipice, and we must urge him quickly down ; for if he once again get the ascendancy, we are not only lost for ever, but his power will be far greater than it was before."

"He will never rise more in this world," answered Cinq Mars. "His day, I trust, is gone by : his health is broken ; and the king, who always hated him, now begins to fear him no longer. I will do my best to strengthen Louis's resolution, and get him into a way of thinking for himself. And now, Fontrailles, for the news from Spain."

"Why, my story might be made longer than yours, if I were to go through all that happened to me on the road. It was a long and barren journey, and I believe I should have been almost starved before I reached Madrid, if I had not half filled my bags with biscuits. However, I arrived at length, and not without some difficulty found a place to lodge, for these cold Spaniards are as fearful of admitting a stranger to their house, as if he were a man-tiger. My next step was to send for a tailor, and to hire me a lackey or two, one of whom I sent instantly to Madame de Chevreuse, praying an audience of her, which was granted immediately."

"Why thou wert not mad enough to make a confidante of Madame de Chevreuse?" exclaimed Cinq Mars ; "why, it is carrying water in a sieve. A thousand to one, she makes her peace with Richelieu, by telling him the whole story."

"Fear not, Cinq Mars," answered Fontrailles, "Have you yet to learn that a woman's first passion is revenge ? To such extent is the hatred of Madame de Chevreuse against the cardinal, that I believe, were she asked to sacrifice one of her beautiful hands, she would do it, if it would but conduce to his ruin."

Cinq Mars shook his head, still doubting the propriety of what had been done ; but Fontrailles proceeded.

"However, I told her nothing ; she knew it all, before I set foot in Spain. You must know, king Philip is a monarch no way insensible to female charms, and the Duchess is too lovely to pass unnoticed any where. The consequences are natural—a lady of her rank having taken refuge in his dominions, of course the king must pay her every attention. He is always with her—has a friendship, a penchant, an affection for her—call it what you will, but it is that sort of feeling which makes a man tell a woman every thing: and thus very naturally our whole correspondence has gone direct to Madame de Chevreuse. My object in first asking to see her, was only to gain an immediate audience of the king, which she can always command; but when I found that she knew the whole business, of course, I made her believe that I came for the express purpose of consulting her upon it. Her vanity was flattered. She became more than ever convinced, that she was a person of infinite consequence, and acknowledged discernment; entered heart and hand into all our schemes; stuck out her pretty little foot, and made me buckle her shoe; brought me speedily to the king's presence, and made him consent to all I wished, got the treaty signed and sealed, and sent me back to France with my object accomplished, remaining herself fully convinced that she is at the head of the most formidable conspiracy that ever was formed, and that future ages will celebrate her talents for diplomacy and intrigue."

Cinq Mars, though not fully satisfied at the admission of so light a being as Madame de Chevreuse into secrets of such importance, could not help smiling at the account his companion gave; and as it was in vain to regret what was done, he turned to the present, asking what was to be done next. "No time is now to be lost," said he. "For the whole danger is now incurred, and we must not allow it to be fruitless."

"Certainly not," answered Fontrailles. "You must ply the king hard to procure his consent as far as possible. In the next place, a counterpart of the treaty must be signed by all the confederates, and sent into Spain, for which I have pledged my word; and another, similarly signed, must be sent to the Duke of Boillon in Italy. But who will carry it to the duke? that is the question. I cannot absent myself again."

"I will provide a messenger," said Cinq Mars. "There is an Italian attached to my service, named Villa Grande, a sort of half-bred gentleman, who, lacking gold himself, hangs upon any who will feed him. They laugh at him here for his long mustaches, and his longer rapier; but if he tell truth, his rapier has done good service; so, as this will be an undertaking of danger, he shall have it, as he says he seeks but to distinguish himself in my service, and being an Italian, he knows the country to which he is going."

"If you can trust him, be it so," replied Fontrailles. "At present let us look to other considerations. We must seek to strengthen our party by all means; for though circumstances seem to combine to favour us, yet it is necessary to guard against any change. Do you think that the queen could be brought to join us?"

"Certainly not!" replied the master of the horse; "and if she would, to us it would be far more dangerous than advantageous. She has no power over the mind of the king—she has no separate authority; and besides, though Richelieu's avowed enemy, she is so cautious of giving offence to Louis, that she would consent to nothing that was not openly warranted by him."

"But suppose we are obliged to have recourse to arms," said Fontrailles, "would it not be every thing in our favour to have in our hands the queen and the heir apparent to the throne?"

"True," answered Cinq Mars; "but if we are driven to such an extremity, she will be obliged to declare for some party, and that of necessity must be ours; for she will never side with Richelieu. We can also have her well surrounded by our friends, and seize upon the dauphin should the case require it."

"What say you, then, to trying the Count de Blénau? He is your friend. He is brave, expert in war, and just such a man as leads the blind multitude. But more, he is wealthy and powerful, and has much credit in Languedoc."

"I do not know," said Cinq Mars thoughtfully, "I do not know.—De Blénau would never betray us, even if he refused to aid our scheme. But I much think his scruples would go farther than even De Thou's. I have often remarked, he has that sort of nicety in his ideas which will not suffer him to enter into any thing which may, by even a remote chance, cast a shade upon his name."

"Well, we can try him at all events," said Fontrailles. "You, Cinq Mars, can ask him whether he will join the liberators of his country."

"No, Fontrailles," answered the master of the horse in a decided tone; "no, I will not do it. Claude de Blè nau is a man by whom I should not like to be refused. Besides, I should hesitate to involve him, young and noble-hearted as he is, in a scheme which might draw down ruin on his head."

"In the name of Heaven, Cinq Mars," cried Fontrailles, with real astonishment at a degree of generosity of which he could find no trace in his own bosom, "of what are you dreaming? Are you frenzied? Why, you have engaged life and fortune, hope and happiness, in this scheme yourself, and can you love another man better?"

"There is every difference, Fontrailles—every difference. If I cut my own throat, I am a fool and a madman, granted; but if I cut the throat of another man, I am a murderer, which is somewhat worse. But I will be plain with you. I have embarked in this with my eyes open, and it is my own fault. Therefore, whatever happens, I will go on and do my best for our success. But mark me, Fontrailles, if all were to come over again, I would rather lay down one of my hands and have it chopped off, than enter into any engagement of the kind."

A cloud came over the brow of Fontrailles for a moment, and a gleam of rage lighted up his dark gray eye, which soon, however, passed away from his features, though the rankling passion still lay at his heart, like a smouldering fire, which wants but a touch to blaze forth and destroy. But his look, as I have said, was soon cleared of all trace of anger; and he replied with that show of cheerfulness which he well knew how to assume. "Well, Cinq Mars, I do not look upon it in so gloomy a light as you do; though perhaps, were it now to begin, I might not be so ready in it either, for the chances we have run were great ; but these, I trust, are over, and every thing certainly looks prosperous at present. Still there is no use of calculating what either of us might do had we now our choice. We are both too far engaged to go back at this time of day : so let us think alone of ensuring success, and the glory of having attempted to free our country will at least be ours, let the worst befall us."

The word glory was never without its effect on Cinq Mars. It was his passion, and was but the more violent from the restraint to which his constant attendance on the king had subjected it, seldom having been enabled to display in their proper field those high qualities which he possessed as a soldier. "So far you are right, Fontrailles," replied he ; "the glory even of the attempt is great, and we have but one course to pursue, which is straightforward to our object. You, do every thing to bind the fickle goddess to our cause, and so will I ; but thinking as I do, I cannot find it in my heart to involve De Blè nau. Manage that as you like ; only do not ask me to do it."

"Oh that is easily done," answered Fontrailles, "without your bearing any part in it. Of course each of the confederates has a right to invite whomsoever he may think proper to join his party, and it would be highly dishonourable of any other to dissuade the person so invited from aiding the scheme on which all our lives depend. The Count de Blè nau, I think you say, is now retired to Bourbon. There is also the Duke of Orleans, and I will take care that he shall broach the subject to the count without implicating you."

Cinq Mars started from his seat, and began pacing the room with his eyes bent on the ground, feeling an undefined sensation of dissatisfaction at the plans of Fontrailles, yet hardly knowing how to oppose them. "Well, well," said he at length ; it is your business, not mine ; and besides, I do not, in the least, think that De Blè nau will listen to you for a moment. He has other things to think of. Mademoiselle de Beaumont is absent, no one knows where ; and he must soon hear of it."

"Be that as it may," replied Fontrailles, "I will try. And now, Cinq Mars, let me touch upon another point ;"

and the wily conspirator prepared all his powers to work upon the mind of his less cautious companion, and to urge him on to an attempt which had already been the object of more than one conspiracy in that day, but which, by some unaccountable means, had always failed without any apparent difficulty or obstacle. This was no other than the assassination of the Cardinal de Richelieu : and those who read the memoirs of the faction-breathing Gondi, or any other of the historical records of the time, will wonder how, without any precaution for his personal safety, Richelieu escaped the many hands that were armed for his destruction.

Princes and nobles, warriors and politicians, had thought it no crime to undertake the death of this tyrant minister ; but yet there was something in the mind of Cinq Mars so opposite to every thing base and treacherous, that Fontenilles feared to approach boldly the proposal he was about to make. " Let us suppose, my noble friend," said he, in that slow and energetic manner which often lends authority to bad argument, " that all our schemes succeed—that the tyrant is stripped of the power he has so abused—that the tiger is enveloped in our toils. What are we to do? Are we to content ourselves with having caught him? Are we only to hold him for a moment in our power, and then to set him loose again, once more to ravage France, and to destroy ourselves? And if we agree to hold him in captivity, where shall we find chains sufficient to bind him, or a cage in which we can confine him with security, when there are a thousand other tigers of his race ready to attack the hunters of their fellow?"

" I propose nothing of the kind," answered Cinq Mars. " Once stripped of his authority, let him be arraigned for the crimes which he has committed, and suffer the death he has merited. The blood of thousands will cry out for justice, and his very creatures will spurn the monster that they served from fear."

" Then you think him worthy of death," said Fontenilles, in that kind of undecided manner which showed that he felt he was treading on dangerous ground.

" Worthy of death!" exclaimed Cinq Mars; " who can doubt it?—Fontrailles, what is it that you mean? You speak as if there was something in your mind that you knew not how to discover. Speak man! What is it you would say?"

"Who will deny that Brutus was a patriot?" said Fontrailles;" "a brave, a noble, and a glorious man? And Brutus stabbed Cæsar in the Capitol!—Cinq Mars, when the freedom of our country is at stake, shall we wait tamely till we have preached a timid monarch into compliance, or drawn a foreign power to our aid, when *one—single—hand—*could do the work of justice, and rid the world of a tyrant who has lived so much too long?"

"Hah!" exclaimed Cinq Mars, starting back, and laying his hand upon his sword; "dost thou suppose me an assassin? Art thou one thyself, that thou canst so well gloze over murder with a stale tale of antiquity?—Monsieur de Fontrailles," he continued more calmly, but still with stern indignation, "you have mistaken the person to whom you addressed yourself. Pardon me. We will speak no more upon this subject, lest we end worse friends than we began."

Fontrailles was not a common hypocrite; he saw at once that on this point persuasion would be vain, and defence of his first proposal would but leave the worse impression on the mind of his companion; and therefore his determination was formed in a moment to take up the exact reverse position to that which he had just occupied, and if possible to force Cinq Mars into a belief that the proposal had only been made to try him. The first wild start of his companion had caused Fontrailles to draw back almost in fear; but instantly recovering himself like a well-trained actor, every muscle of whose face is under command, he fixed his eyes on Cinq Mars, and instead of any sign of anger or disappointment, he regarded him for a moment steadily, gradually throwing into his countenance an expression of gratified admiration. "Cinq Mars, my noble friend!" he exclaimed, opening his arms to embrace him as the other concluded; you are the man I thought you. Pardon me if I have sought to try you! but when I heard you propose to affect the cardinal's life by our plans I knew not how far that idea might lead you, and I wished to be sure of the man with whom I was so deeply engaged. I declare before Heaven that had I found that you proposed to doom Richelieu to death by aught but legal means, I should have been deeply grieved, and would have fled from France where'er my fortune might lead, leaving you to follow your plans as best you might. But I am now satisfied, and demand your pardon for having ever doubted you."

Cinq Mars suffered the embrace which Fontrailles proffered, but returned it coldly. Acting is ever acting, however near it may approach to nature; and notwithstanding all the hypocritical art of which Fontrailles was a master, and which he took care to exert on the present occasion, the mind of Cinq Mars still retained its doubts as to the character of the man with whom he had so closely linked his fate. "If he be a villain," thought the master of the horse, "he is a most black and consummate villain;" and though they parted apparently friends, the recollection of that morning's conversation still haunted the imagination of Cinq Mars like some ill vision; nor did the impression cease with his waking thoughts, but visited him even during the hours of repose, making him believe himself chained in a dungeon, with Fontrailles standing over him turning a dagger round and round in his heart, while ever and anon he cried "Thou art a murderer!"

CHAPTER XXIX.

IN journeying onward towards the Bourbonnois, the thoughts of De Blénau had full time to rest upon the late occurrences; and though these had been of a fearful and impressive nature, yet so rapidly had they passed, that dangers and sorrows, prisons and trials, floated before his remembrance like a confused and uncertain dream; and it required an effort to fix all the particular circumstances in their correct position, for the purpose of investigating the motives of the principal actors in those events which had so deeply affected himself.

This when he could turn his mind from happier contemplations, was the principal occupation of his thoughts; and more especially in reflecting upon the conduct of the king, De Blè nau imagined that he could perceive a regular design in every part of the monarch's behaviour, which in truth it did not possess. Under this view he was left to conclude, that he had been ordered to retire to Bourbon for the specific reason that he had there no acquaintance or influence which could be dangerous to the government; but it is more probable that Louis, not wishing to reverse the cardinal's sentence entirely, by freely pardoning De Blè nau, had in the hurry of the moment mentioned any province that suggested itself. However that might be, it so happened that De Blè nau was hardly known to any individual within the limits to which, by the king's command, he was bound to confine himself. Nor did he feel any additional uncomf ort in the prospect of passing a short space in comparative solitude; for his mind was not likely to be well attuned to society while constrained to absent himself from those he loved best; and he was rather pleased than otherwise, that the time of his separation from Pauline would be passed without the annoyance of associating with people to whom he was indifferent.

De Blè nau's first care, on arriving at Moulins, was to write to Pauline de Beaumont.

Fancy might easily supply his letter, which is otherwise irrecoverably gone; but as each reader's imagination will do more justice to it, according to his own taste, than mine could do, I will leave it unwritten here, especially as I have undertaken to commemorate truth only; and I really know nothing of the matter. Suffice it that it was full of all that affection and gratitude, and hope, and delight could suggest, and gave a bright picture of a bright and happy mind. As couriers and posts in those days were as different from such things at present as the first wooden clock was from a modern chronometer, De Blènau did not choose to trust his letter to the uncertain conveyance of the government carrier, or, as he was then called, the ordinaire ; but placing it in the hands of his trusty page, Henry de la Mothe, he sent him forth upon a journey to St. Germain, with orders to deliver many a kind greeting to Pauline in person, and to bring back an answer with all speed.

The boy set out, and De Blénau, flattering himself with the idea that his banishment from court would not be of any long continuance, took his residence for the time in the immediate neighbourhood of Moulins, contenting himself with an old château, the proprietor of which was very willing—his fortune and his castle both being somewhat decayed—to sacrifice his pride of birth, in consideration of a handsome remuneration from the young count.

Here De Blénau had dwelt some time, waiting the return of his messenger, and in possession of that quiet solitude most consonant to his feelings, when he was disturbed by a billet left at his gate by a horseman, who waited not to be questioned, but rode away immediately after having delivered it. The note itself merely contained a request that the Count de Blénau would ride in the direction of St. Amand on the following evening, at the hour of four, when he would meet with one who had business of importance to communicate. The handwriting was unknown to him, and De Blénau at first hesitated whether to obey the summons or not ; but curiosity has a thousand ways of strengthening itself, and at last he reasoned himself into a belief that, whatever it might be, no harm could accrue from his compliance.

Accordingly, on the following evening, as the hour drew near, he mounted his horse, and, accompanied by his usual attendants, proceeded towards St. Amand. Having ridden on for more than an hour without meeting any one above the rank of a peasant, he began to accuse himself for having been the dupe of what might prove some foolish joke. He had even reined in his horse with the purpose of returning, when he perceived a person approaching on horseback, who, notwithstanding a sort of carelessness,—even, perhaps, slovenliness of manner and carriage,—had about him that undefinable air which, in all ages and in every guise, denotes a gentleman, and a distinguished one. It was not, however, till he came near, that De Blénau recognised Gaston, Duke of Orleans, whom he had not seen for some time. The moment he did remember him, he gave him the centre of the road, and saluting him respectfully, was passing on, never dreaming that the summons he had received could have proceeded from him.

"Good day, Monsieur de Blénau; you are close upon the hour," said the duke, drawing up his horse, and at once allowing the count to understand that it was with him that the appointment had been made.

"I was not aware," replied De Blénau, "that the summons which I received last night was from so honourable a hand, or I should have had no hesitation in obeying."

"Why, that is right," said the duke. "The truth is, I wished much to see you, Monsieur le Comte, upon a business wherein you may not only be of much service to yourself and me, but also to your country. We will ride on, if you please; and as we go, I will explain myself further."

De Blénau turned his horse and rode on with the duke; but the warning which Chavigni had given him came strongly into his mind; and Gaston of Orleans was too famous for the unfortunate conspiracies in which he had been engaged, for De Blénau to think with aught but horror of acting in any way with a man, the weak versatility of whose disposition had already brought more than one of his friends to the scaffold. He therefore waited for the duke's communication, determined to cut it short as soon as propriety admitted; and even to deviate from the respect due to his rank, rather than become the confidant of a prince whose station was his sole title to reverence.

"You do not answer me, Monsieur de Blénau," said the duke, after having waited a moment or two for some reply. "Are you, sir, inclined to serve your country; or is the Cardinal de Richelieu your good friend?"

"That I am inclined to serve my country," replied De Blénau, "your highness need not doubt; and when my sword can avail that country against a foreign adversary, it shall always be ready at her call. In regard to his Eminence of Richelieu, I hope that he is no more my enemy than I am his; and that he will no more attempt to injure me than I will to injure him."

"But has he not endeavoured to injure you already?" said the duke. "Listen to me, Sir Count. Suppose that there were many men at this moment well inclined to free France from the yoke under which she labours. Suppose I were to tell you that ——"

"Le me beseech your highness," interposed De Blènaux, "to tell me no more; for if I understand you rightly, it must be a confidence dangerous either to you or me—dangerous to you if I reveal it, and dangerous to me if I do not. Pardon me, my lord, for interrupting you; but let my ears remain in their present innocence of what you mean. What may be your wishes with me, I know not; but before you proceed further, let me say that I will enter into no scheme whatever against a government to which his majesty has given his sanction, and which it is always in his power to alter or remove at his pleasure, without any one being entitled to question his authority either in raising it or casting it down. And now, having ventured to premise thus much, if I can serve your highness personally, in any way where my honour and my allegiance are not at all implicated, I shall be most happy in an opportunity of showing my attachment to your royal person and family."

"Why then, Monsieur de Blènaux," replied the duke, "I think the best thing we can do is, to turn our horses different ways, and forget that we have met to-day at all. Our conference has been short, but it has been to the purpose. But of course, before we part, I expect your promise, as a man of honour, that you will not betray me."

"I have nothing to betray, my lord," replied De Blènaux with a smile. "We have met on the road to St. Amand. We have not been five minutes in each other's company. Your highness has told me nothing, whatever I may have suspected; therefore you may rest perfectly secure that I have nothing to betray, even if they put me to the torture to-morrow. But as I think that, for your highness's sake, we had better be as little together as possible, I will humbly take my leave."

So saying, De Blè nau bowed low, and turned his horse towards Moulins, the Duke of Orleans preparing to take the other road; but suddenly the latter stopped, and turning his head, asked if De Blè nau had gained any news of Mademoiselle de Beaumont.

"I am not aware of what your highness alludes to," replied De Blè nau, quickly reining in his horse, and returning to the side of the duke.

"What, then you have not heard—When had you letters from St. Germain?"

"Heard what? In the name of God, speak, my lord!" cried De Blè nau: "do not keep me in suspense."

"Nay, Monsieur de Blè nau, I know but little," answered the duke. "All my news came yesterday in a letter from St. Germain, whereby I find that Mademoiselle de Beaumont has disappeared; and as no one knows whither she is gone, and no cause is apparent for her voluntary absence, it is conjectured that Richelieu, finding, as it is whispered, that she endeavoured to convey intelligence to you in the Bastille, has caused her to be arrested and confined au secret."

"But when did she disappear?—Who saw her last?—Have no traces been discovered?—Why do they not apply to the king?" exclaimed De Blè nau, with a degree of agitation that afforded amusement, rather than excited sympathy in the frivolous mind of the Duke of Orleans.

"Really, Monsieur de Blè nau, to none of all your questions can I at all reply," answered Gaston. "Very possibly the lady may have gone off with some fair lover, in which case she will have taken care to leave no traces of her flight. What think you of the weather?—will it rain to-day?"

"Hell and fury!" cried De Blè nau, incensed at the weak trifling of the prince, at a moment when his feelings were so deeply interested; and turning his horse round without further adieu, he struck his spurs into the animal's sides, and, followed by his attendants, galloped off towards Moulins. Arrived at the château which he inhabited, his thoughts were still in such a troubled state as to forbid all calm consideration. "Prepare every thing to set out! Saddle fresh horses! Send to Moulins for the propriétaire!" were De Blénau's first commands, determined at all risks to set out for St. Germain, and seek for Pauline himself. But while his orders were in train of execution, reflection came to his aid, and he began to think that the news which the duke had given him might not be true—that Gaston might either be deceived himself, or that he might have invented the story for the purpose of forcing him into a conspiracy against Richelieu's government. "At all events," thought he, "Henry de la Mothe cannot be longer absent than to-morrow. I may miss him on the road, and thus be four days without information instead of one." Accordingly, after some further hesitation, he determined to delay his journey one day, and counterordered the preparations which he had before commanded. Nevertheless, his mind was too much agitated to permit of his resting inactive; and quitting the château, he walked quickly on the road towards Paris; but he had not proceeded more than a quarter of a league, when from the top of a hill he perceived a horseman coming at full speed towards him. At first, while the distance rendered his form altogether indistinct, De Blénau decided that it was Henry de la Mothe—it must be—it could be nobody else. Then again he began to doubt—the horse did not look like his; and De Blénau had almost determined that it was not his page, when the fluttering scarf of blue and gold becoming apparent, decided the question, and he hurried forward, impatient even of the delay which must yet intervene.

The page rode on at full speed; and even from that circumstance De Blénau drew an unfavourable augury: he had something evidently to communicate which required haste. His horse, too, was not the same which had carried him away, and he must have changed him on the road: this too was a sign of that urgent despatch which could alone proceed from some painful cause.

However, the page came rapidly forward, recognised his lord, and drawing in his rein, alighted to give relief to De Blè nau's doubts, only by confirming his fears.

His first tidings were perfectly similar to the information which had been given by the Duke of Orleans; but the more minute details which he had obtained, forming part of the history which he gave De Blè nau of all that had occurred to him on his journey, I shall take the liberty of abridging myself, instead of leaving them in the desultory and long-winded condition in which they proceeded from the mouth of Monsieur de la Mothe.

Setting out from Moulins on one of the Count de Blè nau's strongest horses, and furnished with plenty of that patent anti-attrition composition, which has facilitated the progression of all sorts of people in all ages of the world, and in all states except in Lycurgus-governed Sparta—namely, gold, Henry de la Mothe was not long in reaching St. Germain; and with all the promptitude of his age and nature, he hastened eagerly towards the palace, promising himself infinite pleasure in delivering a genuine love-letter into the fair hands of Mademoiselle Pauline. No small air of consequence, therefore, did he assume in inquiring for Mademoiselle de Beaumont, and announcing that he must speak with her himself: but the bovish vivacity of the page was soon changed into sorrowful anxiety, when the old servant of Anne of Austria, to whom his inquiries had been addressed, informed him that the young lady had disappeared, and was no where to be heard of. Now Henry de la Mothe, the noble Count de Blè nau's gay page, was an universal favourite at St. Germain; so out of pure kindness, and without the least inclination in the world to gossip, the old servant took him into the palace, and after treating him to a cup of old St. Vallier wine, told him all about the disappearance of Pauline, which formed a history occupying exactly one hour and ten minutes in delivering.

Amongst other interesting particulars, he described to the page how he himself had accompanied Mademoiselle de Hauteford and Mademoiselle de Beaumont from Chantilly to Paris, for the purpose of conveying news to Monsieur de Blénau, in the Bastille;—and how that night he followed the two young ladies as far as the church of St. Gervais, where they separated, and he remained at the church-door, while Mademoiselle de Hauteford went in and prayed for the good success of Pauline;—and, further, how Mademoiselle de Hauteford said all the prayers she knew, and composed a great many new ones to pass the time, and yet no Pauline returned;—and how at last she came out to know what had become of her;—and how he told her, that he could not tell.

He then went on to describe their search for Pauline, and their disappointment and distress at not finding her, and the insolence of a lying innkeeper, who lived opposite the prison, and who assured him that the young lady was safe, for that he himself had delivered her from peril by the valour of his invincible arm. After this, he took up the pathetic, and showed forth in moving terms the agony and despair of Madame de Beaumont on first hearing of the non-appearance of her daughter; and then commented upon the extraordinary insensibility that she had since shown. “For after two days,” said he, “she seemed to grow quite satisfied, and to forget it all, the cold-hearted old——cat.”

“’Tis just like her,” said Henry de la Mothe.

“They say, when her husband was killed, she never shed a tear. But mark me, Monsieur Mathieu, she shall not have the count’s letter. As mademoiselle is not here, I’ll take it back to him unopened; so have a care not to tell the old marquise that I have been here. Before I go back, however, I’ll away to Paris, to gather what news I can. That aubergiste meant something—I know him well. ’Tis old Jacques Chatpilleur, the vivandier, who served with the army in Roussillon, when I was there with the count.”

“Well, well, my good youth, go to Paris if you please,” replied the old servant. “You’ll gain no tidings more than I have given you.—Did not I make all sorts of inquiries myself? and they are not likely to deceive me, I

wot. Young birds think they can fly before they can peck; but go, go,—you'll gain no more than what I have told you."

Henry de la Mothe did not feel very well assured of the truth of this last position; and therefore, though his back ached with a four day's ride as fast as he could go, he set out again for Paris, where he arrived before nightfall; and entering the city by the Port St. Antoine, directed his course to the house of our doughty friend, Jacques Chatpilleur, where he was instantly acknowledged as an old acquaintance by the worthy aubergiste, and treated with suitable distinction. Although every moment was precious, the page did not think fit to enter upon the business that brought him till the auberge was clear of intruders; and this being the hour at which many an honest burgess of the city solaced his inward man with boudin blanc and Burgundy, when the fatigues of the day began to cease, Henry de la Mothe thought he might as well follow the same agreeable calling, and while he was at Rome, do as Romans did.

More than an hour passed before the page had an opportunity of communicating fully with the good aubergiste; but when Jacques Chatpilleur heard that the lady he had delivered from the clutches of Letrames was no less a person than Pauline, only daughter and heiress of the late celebrated Marquis de Beaumont, and that, notwithstanding his assistance, she had somehow been carried off on that identical night, his strange woodcock-shaped person became agitated with various extraordinary contortions, proceeding from an odd mixture of pleasure and grief, which at once took possession of him, and contended for the mastery.

"Mon Dieu!" cried he, "to think that it was Made-moiselle de Beaumont, and that she should be lost after all!" And the aubergiste set himself to think of how it could all have happened. "I'll bet a million," cried he at length, starting from his reverie, and clapping his hands together with a concussion that echoed to the Bastille itself—"I'll bet a million that it was that great gluttonous Norman vagabond who on that very night eat me up a matelot d'anguille and a dinde piquée. He is understrapping cut-throat to Master Chavigni, and he has never been here since. He has carried her off, for a million; and taken her away to some prison in the provinces, all for trying to give a little news to the good count. But I'll ferret out his route for you. On with your beaver and come with me. Margueritte, look to the doors while I am absent. I know where the scoundrel lodged; so come along, and we'll soon hear more of him."

So saying, the landlord of the Sanglier Gourmand led Henry de la Mothe forth into the Rue St. Antoine, and thence through the several turnings and windings by which the Norman had carried Pauline to the late lodgings of Monsieur Marteville. Here Jacques Chatpilleur summoned all the persons in the house, male and female, lodger and landlord, to give a full, true, and particular account of all they knew, believed, or suspected, concerning the tall Norman who usually dwelt there. And such was the tone of authority which he used, and the frequency of his reference to Henry de la Mothe, whom he always specified as "this honourable youth," that the good folks instantly transformed, in their own imaginations, the page of the Count de Blénau into little less than the valet de chambre of the prime minister, and consequently answered all questions with becoming deference.

The sum of the information which was thus obtained, amounted to this: that on the evening in question, Mons. Marteville had brought thither a young lady—whether by force or not, no one could specify; that she was dressed as a Languedoc peasant, which Monsieur Chatpilleur acknowledged to be the disguise Pauline had assumed, and that the same evening he had carried her away again on horseback, leading her steed by the bridle rein. It further appeared that the Norman, while preparing to set out, had asked a great many questions about Troyes in Champagne, and had inquired whether there was not a wood extending over some leagues near Mesnil St. Loup, which was reported to be infested by robbers. From all this the inhabitants of the house had concluded universally, that his journey was destined to be towards Troyes, and that he would take care to avoid the wood of Mesnil St Loup.

Henry de la Mothe now fancied that he had the clue completely in his hands, and returning with Jacques Chappilleur to his auberge, he took one night's necessary rest, and having exchanged his horse, which was knocked up with its journey, he set out the next morning on his return to Moulins.

After this recital, all considerations of personal safety, the king's command to remain in Bourbon, the enmity of the cardinal, and the warnings of Chavigni, vanished from the mind of De Blénau like smoke; and returning to the château, he directed his horses to be instantly prepared, chose ten of his most resolute servants to accompany him, ordered Henry de la Mothe to remain till he had recovered from his fatigues, and then to return to St. Germain, and tell Madame de Beaumont that he would send her news of her daughter, or lose his life in the search; and having made all other necessary arrangements, he took his departure for Troyes without a consideration of the consequences.

CHAPTER XXX.

WE must now return to the two worthy personages whom we left jogging on towards the Château of St. Loup, taking them up at the precise place where we set them down.

"Bon gré mal gré va le prêtre au séné," grumbled the Norman. "Remember, Madame Louise I bring you with no good will; you insist upon going; so now if you meet with any thing disagreeable, it is your own fault—mark that, ma poule."

"I'm no more afraid of the devil than yourself," answered Louise pertly; "and I suppose I shall meet with no one worse than he is."

"You may," replied the Norman; "but come on, it gets late, and we have no time to spare."

The tone of Marteville was not very encouraging; but Louise was resolved not to lose sight of her husband, and being by nature as bold as a lion, she followed on without fear. True it is, that she did not know the whole history of the Sorcerer's Grove, or perhaps she might have felt some of those imaginary terrors from which hardly a bosom in France was altogether free; although Louise, bred up by Madame de Beaumont, whose strong and masculine mind rejected most of the errors of that age, had perhaps less of the superstition of the day than any other person of her own class.

The first approach to the Sorcerer's Grove was any thing but terrific. The road, winding gently down the slope of the hill, entered the forest between some fine tall trees, which rising out of a tract of scanty underwood and open ground, with considerable spaces between each of the boles, afforded plenty of room for the rich sun to pour his rays between, and to chequer the green shadows of the wood with intervals of golden light. Every here and there, also, the declining sunbeams caught upon the old knotted trunks, and on the angles of the broken ground on either side, enlivening the scene without taking from its repose; and at the bottom of the hill, seen through the arch of boughs which canopied the way, appeared a bright mass of sunshine, with a glimpse of the sky beyond, where a larger open space than ordinary gave free access to the day. From this spot, however, the road, entering the deeper part of the wood, took a direction towards the old Château of St. Loup; and here the trees, growing closer together, began to shut out the rays: gloom and darkness spread over the path, and the rocks rising up into high broken banks on each side, cut off even the scanty light which glided between the thick branches above. At the same time, the whole scenery assumed a wilder and more desolate character, and the windings of the road round the base of the hill prevented the eye from penetrating beyond the solemn dimness of the still sad grove through which they passed.

Here, strewed upon the path, lay great masses of green mouldy rock, fallen from the banks on each side, evincing plainly how seldom the foot of man traversed its solitude; there again a mundic stream, blood-red, flowed across and tinged all the earth around with its own unseemly hue; while long brambles and creeping shrubs, dropping with chill dew, grew at the base of the rocks on either side, and shooting out their thorny arms, caught the feet of the horses as they passed. The deep solitude, the profound silence, the shadow of the overhanging woods, and the sombre gloom of every object around, began to have their effect on the mind of Louise; and, notwithstanding her native boldness of heart, she set herself to conjure up more than one unpleasing vision. Her fears, however, were more of the living than the dead; and having now, against her nature, kept silence a long while, out of respect to the angry humour of her dearly beloved husband, she ventured to assert that it looked quite a place for robbers, and added a hope that they should not meet any.

"Pardie! I hope we shall!" replied the Norman. "Those you call robbers are fort honnêtes gens: they are merely gentlemen from the wars, as I am myself: soldiers at free quarters, who have ever had a right prescriptive to levy their pay with their own hand. I beg that you will speak respectfully of them."

Louise looked at her husband with an inquiring glance, not very well knowing whether to take his speech seriously, or merely as a jest; but there was nothing mirthful in the countenance of Monsieur Marteville, who, out of humour with his fair lady for persisting to accompany him, was in no mood for jesting. At this moment a whistle was heard in the wood, so like the note of a bird, that Louise was deceived, and would have taken no further notice of the sound, had not her companion applied his hand to his lips, and imitated it exactly.

"What is that?" demanded Louise, upon whose mind a thousand undefined suspicions were crowding fast: "What noise is that in the wood?"

"It's only a pivert," replied the Norman with a grim smile, in the effort of which the scar upon his lip drew the corner of his mouth almost into his eye.

"A pivert!" replied Louise; "no, no—that is not the cry of a woodpecker—you are cheating me!"

"Well, you will see," replied Marteville; "I'll make him come out." So saying, he repeated the same peculiar whistle, and then drawing in his rein, shook himself in the saddle, loosened his sword in the sheath, and laid his hand on one of his holsters, as a man who prepares for an encounter, of the event of which he is not quite certain whether it will be for peace or war.

His whistle was again returned, and a moment after the form of a man was seen protruding itself through the trees that crowned the high bank under which they stood. His rusty iron morion, his still rustier cuirass, his weather-beaten countenance and dingy apparel, formed altogether an appearance so similar to the trunks of the trees amongst which he stood, that he would have been scarcely distinguishable, had it not been for the effort to push his way through the lower branches, the rustling of which, and a few falling stones forced over the edge of the rock at his approach, drew the eye more particularly to the spot where he appeared. In his hand he carried a firelock, which, by a natural impulse, was pointed at the Norman the moment he perceived a doublet of blue velvet—as the fowling-piece of a sportsman is instinctively carried to his shoulder, on the rising of a partridge or a grouse. But Monsieur Marteville was prepared for all such circumstances; and drawing the pistol which hung at his saddle-bow, and which, if one might judge by length, would carry a mile at least, he pointed directly towards the rusty gentleman above described, crying out. "Eh bien, l'ami! Eh bien! Do you shoot your friends like woodcocks? or have you forgotten me?"

"Nom de Dieu!" cried the man above: "Je vous en demande mille pardons, et mille, Monsieur le Capitaine. I'll come down to you directly. Christi! I had nearly given you a ball! But I'll come down."

While the robber was putting this promise in execution, Marteville whispered a few words of consolation to

Louise, bidding her not be afraid, that they were fort honnêtes gens, tres aimables to their friends, et cetera, but seeing that his words produced no effect, and that the unfortunate girl, beginning to comprehend the nature of his character, had burst into tears of bitter regret, he muttered a curse or two, not loud, but deep : and without any farther effort to allay her fears, sat whistling on his horse, till the robber, half sliding, half running, managed to descend from the eminence on which he had first appeared.

"Eh bien, Callot," said Monsieur Marteville to his former companion, after the first polite salutations usual on such occasions, "how goes it with the troop?"

"But badly," replied Callot : "what with one devilry or another, we have but half a dozen left."

"And where is Pierrepont Le Blanc?" demanded the Norman: "Could not he keep you together?"

"Oh! we have sent him to the kingdom of moles," answered the robber, twisting his face into a most horrible grin. "First he quarrelled with one, and then he quarrelled with another; and then, as he was captain, and had the purse, he bethought him of taking himself off with all the treasure. But we caught him on the road; and so, as I have said, we sent the buccaneer on an embassy to the kingdom of moles. After that, there were two of us shot near Epernay, by a party of the Guard; and then six more went to see what could be gathered upon the road to Perpignan, and one was taken and hanged at Troyes; so that there are but myself and five others of the old band left."

"And quite enough too, if you had a bold leader," replied the Norman. "But where do you roost, mes jolis oiseaux?"

"No, no; we do not perch now," answered the robber; "we go to earth. Under the old castle here are the most beautiful vaults in the world; and I defy Beelzebub himself to nose us when we are hidden there."

"But why not take to the château itself? Is it so far decayed?"

"Nay," replied the other, "for that matter, it's as good a nest as any one would wish to house in : but it is not quite so forsaken as folks think. We did put up there at first ; but one night, while all of our party were out but three—being myself and two others who stayed—we heard suddenly the sound of horses, and looking out, we saw by the twilight five stout cavaliers dismount in the court ; an up they marched to the very room where we were sitting so that we had scarce time to bundle up our things and to cover. And there they sat for four good hours ; while we were shut up in the little watch-tower next to them, with no way to get out, and no powder but what was in our carbines, or mayhap we should have given them a dose or two of leaden pills, for at first we thought they were on the look-out for our band. But presently after, up came another, and then they all set to, to talk high treason. I could not well hear, for the door was so thick, and we dared not move ; but I know they spoke of a treaty with Spain, and bringing in Spanish troops into France. Since then, we have kept to the vaults for fear of being nosed."

" Well, Louise," whispered the Norman, turning to the soubrette, " you see I did not come here for no purpose. It is this treaty with Spain I want to find out ; and if I do, our fortune is made for ever, and you will eat off gold, and drink out of gold, and be as happy as a princess !"

The prospects which her husband held out, and which might certainly be called golden, were not without their effect on Louise ; but still his evident familiarity with the gentleman in the rusty steel coat, did not at all suit her ideas of propriety, nor were the matters which they discussed in the least to her taste ; but as remonstrance was in vain, and she began to perceive that the influence of her tears was not very great, she resigned herself to her fate in silence.

Several more questions and replies passed between the Norman and his ancient comrade, which, as they tend to throw no light upon this history, shall not find a place therein. At length Monsieur Callot, in as hospitable and courtly a strain as he could assume, requested the pleasure of Monsieur Marteville's company to spend the evening in the vaults the old château, if he had not grown too fine, by living among the great, to associate with his old friends. In return for this, the worthy Norman assured him, that he never was so happy as when he was in their society, accepted the invitation with pleasure, and begged to introduce his wife. Callot would fain have offered his salute to the lips of the fair lady, and had mounted on a huge stone beside her horse for that purpose ; but Louise repulsed him with the dignity of a duchess, and Callot did not press the matter further, merely giving a shrewd wink of the eye and screw of the under jaw, as much as to say, " she's nice, it seems," and then led the way towards the present abode of Marteville's old band.

The road which he took wound through the very depth of the wood towards that side of the hill which, looking over the wide extent of forest-ground lying between the old castle and the high road to Troyes, seemed to offer nothing but dark inaccessible precipices, from the shallow stream that ran bubbling at its base, to the walls of the ruin above. Crossing the rivulet, however, which did not rise higher than the horses' knees, the robber led the way round a projecting mass of rock, that seemed to have been forcibly riven from the rest, and which, though it left space enough for the horses to turn, would have effectually concealed them from the sight of any one who might be in the wood.

The two sides of the hill next to the village of Mesnil, and the ridge of rising ground on which it was situated, sloped easily into the valleys around, and were covered with a rich and glowing vegetation ; but on the northern, as well as the western side, which the Norman and his companions now approached, the rock offered a very different character, and one, indeed, extremely rare in that part of the country.

Wherever the eye turned, nothing presented itself but flat surfaces of cold gray stone, with the deep markings of the rifts and hollows which separated them from each other. Occasionally, indeed, a patch of thin vegetable earth, accumulating on any point that offered the means of support, yielded a slight gleam of verdure, so pure in hue, and so limited in extent, that it seemed alone to rival the lichens and stains of the rocks around, and to serve but as a mockery of the naked crag that bore it. Here and there, too, a black antique pine, fixing its sturdy roots in the bleakest pinnacles, would be seen to star boldly out, as if to brave the tempests that, sweeping over the oaks in the forest below, spent their full fury on its more ambitious head. The principal objects, however that attracted attention, were the multitude of deep fissures and hollows which presented themselves at every point and the immense blocks of stone, which, scattered about round the base of the rock, offered plentiful means of concealment to any one who might there seek to baffle a pursuer.

Turning, as we have said, round the base of one of these large masses, the robber uttered three loud whistles, to give notice that it was a friend approached; and immediately after, from a cavern, the mouth of which was concealed in one of the fissures above mentioned, came forth two figures, whose wild apparel corresponded very well with that of their companion.

"Morbleu! Monsieur Marteville!" cried one of them, the moment he recognised the Norman, "est-ce vous? Soyez le bien venu! Come at a lucky moment for some of the best wine of Bonne! The Gros St. Nicolas—you remember our old companion—has just returned from the Chemin de Troyes, where he met two charitable monks, who, out of pure benevolence, bestowed upon him three panniers of good wine and twelve broad pieces; though they threatened to excommunicate him, and the two who were with him, for holding steel poniards to their throats while they did their alms. However, you are heartily welcome, and the more so if you are come to stay with us."

"We will talk of that presently," said the Norman; "but in the first place, good friends, tell me, can one get up to the castle above, which, Callot says, is habitable yet? for here is my wife, who is not much used to dwell in vaults, and may like a lodging above ground better."

"Oh, certainly! Madame shall be accommodated," said the last speaker, who seemed to be more civilized than good Monsieur Callot. "Our own dwelling is well enough; but if she so pleases, I will show you up the staircase which leads from the vaults to the court above. However, I hope she will stay to partake of our supper, which is now before the fire, as you shall see."

"She shall come down again," said the Norman, dismounting, and lifting Louise out of the saddle. "and will thank you for your good cheer, for we have ridden far." So saying, he followed into the cave, which at first presented nothing but the natural ruggedness of the rock; but at that spot where the daylight began to lose its effect in the increasing darkness of the cavern, one might perceive, though with difficulty, that it assumed the form of a regular arch cased with masonry; and in a moment or two, as they proceeded, groping their way after the robber, they were warned that there were steps: mounting these, and turning to the left, they discerned, at a little distance in advance, a bright red light streaming from behind a projecting angle, which itself remained in utter obscurity. The robber here went on first, and they heard him announce, in a loud and jocular tone, "Le Sieur Marteville, et Madame sa femme!" with as much ceremony as if he had been heralding them into the presence of royalty.

"Bah! vous plaisantez!" cried a thick merry voice, seeming as if it issued from the midst of stewed prunes. But the Norman advancing, bore evidence of the truth of the other's annunciation, and was instantly caught in the arms of the Gros St. Nicolas, as he was called, who merited, at least, the appellation of gros, though with the sanctity he appeared to have but little to do. He was fat, short, and protuberant, with a face as round as the full moon, and as rosy as a peony. In fact, he seemed much better fitted for a burgess or a priest, an innkeeper or an alderman, than for the thin and meagre trade of a cut-purse, which seldom leaves any thing but bones to be hanged at last. However, he bore him jollily; and when the party entered, was, with morion and breastplate thrown aside, engaged in basting a large quarter of venison, which smoked before a stupendous fire, whose blaze illuminated all the wide vault, which formed their salle à manger and kitchen, both in one.

"Est-il possible !" cried the Gros St. Nicolas, embracing our Norman, whose companion he had been for many years, both in honourable and dishonourable trades ;—"Mon ami ! Mon capitaine ! Mon brave ! Mon prince ! Enfin, mon Norman !"

Quitting the ecstasies of the Gros St. Nicolas at meeting once more with his friend, and the formalities of his introduction to Louise, we shall only say that, according to the request of the Norman, one of the freebooters led the way up a spiral staircase in the rock, which soon brought them into the open air, through a small arch, entering upon the court of the old castle. Here Marteville, having marked all the peculiar turns which they had taken with the accuracy which his former life had taught, bade good day to their guide, promising to rejoin the party below by the time the venison was roasted ; and finding that more than an hour of daylight yet remained, he proceeded with Louise to explore the remains of the château.

The little attentions he had lately paid had greatly conciliated his fair lady ; and though still somewhat disposed to pout, she suffered him to explain his views with a tolerable degree of placability. "You must know, ma charmante Louise," said he, "that there is a tremendous plot going on against the government, and that Monsieur de Chavigni has instructed me to discover it. You heard what Callot said concerning a treaty with Spain. Now, I have always understood, that when these secret treaties are formed, a copy is deposited in some uninhabitable place for greater security. You see I have traced Fontrailles to this castle, and it is evident that here he met the other conspirators : now, where, then, can they have secreted the treaty but somewhere about here ? So now, Louise, help me to find this paper, if it is to be found ; and then we will soon quit these men, of whom you seem so much afraid, and go and live like princes on the fortune that Chavigni has promised."

To this long speech of her husband, which he accompanied with sundry little caresses, Louise replied, in a tone still half sulky, that she was ready to seek the paper, but that she did not see how they could find it, with nothing to guide them in the search. But nevertheless, when they did seriously begin their perquisitions, she displayed all that sagacity in discovering a secret which women instinctively possess. Of course, the first place to which they particularly directed their inquiries was the chamber in which, according to the account of Callot, the meeting of the conspirators had been held.

Here they looked in every nook and corner, turned over every heap of rubbish, examined the chairs and the table of old Père Le Rouge, and having gone over every inch of the apartment, began anew and went over it again. At length Louise, seemingly tired of her search in that chamber, left her husband to pursue it as he pleased, and sitting down in one of the settles, began to hum a Languedoc air, beating time with her fingers on the table.

"Pardie!" cried the Norman, after having hunted for some time in vain; "it is not here, that is certain."

"Yes, it is!" said Louise, very quietly continuing to beat time on the table; "it is in this very room."

"Nom de Dieu! where is it then?" cried Monsieur Marteville.

"It is here, in the inside of this hollow piece of wood," answered Louise, tapping the table with her knuckles, which produced that sort of empty echoing sound that evinced that it was not so solid as it appeared.

The Norman now approached, and soon convincing himself that Louise was right, he took her in his arms and gave her a kiss that made the ruin echo. The next thing was to get into the drawer, or whatsoever it was, that occupied the interior of the table; but this not proving very easy, the impatient Norman set it upright upon one end, and drawing his sword, soon contrived to cleave it through the middle; when, to the delight of the eyes that looked upon it, appeared a large cavity neatly wrought in the wood, containing a packet of vellum folded, and sealed at all corners in blue and yellow wax, with neat pieces of floss-silk to keep it all together. The Norman could have eaten it up; and Louise, with a degree of impatient curiosity peculiarly her own, was already fingering one of the seals, about to break it open, when Marteville stopped her with a tremendous oath: "What are you going to do?" cried he; "you know little what it is to pry into state secrets. If you had opened that seal, instead of having, perhaps, a reward of twenty thousand crowns, we should both have been sent to the Bastille for the rest of our lives." Louise dropped the packet in dismay; and the Norman continued: "Did you never hear of the Abbé de Langy, who happening to be left by Monsieur de Richelieu in his private cabinet only five minutes, with some state papers on the table, was sent to the Bastille for twelve years, merely for fear he had read them? No, no; this must go to Monsieur Chavigni without so much as cracking the wax."

"Could not we just look in at the end?" demanded Louise, looking wistfully at the packet, which her husband had now picked up. But upon this he put a decided negative; and having now succeeded to his heart's content, the burly Norman, in the exuberance of his joy, began singing and capering till the whole pile both echoed and shook with his gigantic gambols. "Ma Louise," cried he at length, "vous êtes fatiguée. Je vais vous porter;" and catching her up in his arms, notwithstanding all remonstrance, he carried her like a feather into the courtyard, through the narrow arch, and threading all the intricacies of the vaults with the same sagacious facility with which a ferret glides through the windings of a warren, he bore her safely in triumph into the salle à manger of the honourable fraternity below. This was not the mode of progression which Louise most admired, nor was she very much gratified at being exhibited to her husband's old friends in so ungraceful an attitude; and the consequences, of course, were, that she would willingly have torn his eyes out, had she dared.

However, Monsieur Callot, Le Gros St. Nicolas, and others, applied themselves successfully to soothe her ruffled spirits; and the venison being ready, and a long table laid, each person drew forth his knife, and soon committed infinite havoc on the plump haunch which was placed before them. The wine succeeded, and then that water of life which very often ends in death. All was hilarity and mirth, song, jest, and laughter. Gradually, one barrier after another fell, as cup succeeded cup. Each one told his own story, without regard to the rest; each one sang his own song; each one cracked his own joke. Louise had retired to a settle by the side of the fire, but still mingled in the conversation, when it could be called such; and Monsieur Callot, somewhat full of wine, and a good deal smitten with her charms, plied her with assiduities rather more perhaps than was necessary. In the mean time, the Gros St. Nicolas, running over with brandy and good spirits, kept jesting the Norman upon some passages of his former life, which might as well have been passed over and forgotten. "Madame!" cried he at length, turning round towards Louise, with an overflowing goblet in his hand, and his broad face full of glee, "I have the honour of drinking to your health, as the fifth spouse of our good friend, Monsieur de Marteville; and let me assure you, that of the three that are living and the two that are dead, you are the most beautiful beyond compare!"

Up started Louise in an agony of indignation, and forth she poured upon the Gros St. Nicolas a torrent of vituperation for jesting upon such a subject. But on his part he only shrugged his shoulders, and declared that he did not jest at all. "Mon Dieu!" said he, "it is very unreasonable to suppose that Monsieur Marteville, who is as big as five men, should be contented with one wife. Besides, it is très agréable to have a wife in every province; I always do so myself."

The thunder of Louise's ire, now increased in a seven-fold degree, was turned instantly on her dearly-beloved husband. Her eyes flashed, and her cheek flamed, and approaching him, where he sat laughing at the whole business, she demanded that he should exculpate himself from this charge of pentigamy, with a tone and manner that made the Norman, who had drunk quite enough, laugh still more. With an unheard-of objection of self-command, Louise kept her fingers from his face; but she burst forth into reproaches, which none but an injured woman's utmost wrath could have conceived, so bitter and stinging, that Marteville's mirth was soon converted into rage, and he looked at her with a glance which would quickly have taught those who knew him well not to urge him on further. But Louise went on, and wound up by declaring, that she would live with him no longer—that she would quit him that very moment, and finding her way to Monsieur de Chavigni, would tell him all—adding, that she would soon send the guard to ferret out that nest of ruffians, and that she hoped to see him hanging at the head of them. With this expression of her intentions, Louise departed out of the vault; but the Norman, who, speechless with rage, had sat listening to her with his teeth clenched, and his neither lip quivering with suppressed passion, started suddenly up, cast the settle from him with such force that it was dashed to pieces against the wall, and strode after her with the awful cloud of determined wrath settled upon his brow.

The mirth of the robbers, who knew the ungovernable nature of their companion's passion, was now over, and each looked in the face of the other with silent expectation. After a space, there was the murmur of angry voices heard for a moment at the farther end of the passage; then a loud piercing shriek rang through the vault; and then all was silence. A momentary sensation of horror ran through the bosoms of even the ferocious men, whose habits rendered them familiar with almost every species of bloodshed. But this was new and strange amongst them, and they waited the return of the Norman with feelings near akin to awe.

At length, after some time, he came with a firm step and unblenching brow, but with a haggard wildness in his eye which seemed to tell that remorse was busy with his heart. However, he sat him down without any allusion to the past, and draining off a cup of wine, strove laboriously after merriment. But it was in vain; the mirth of the whole party was evidently forced; and Marteville soon took up another strain, which accorded better with the feelings of the moment. He spoke to them of the dispersion of the band, which had taken place since he left them; announced his intention of joining them again; and drawing forth a purse containing about a thousand livres, he poured them forth upon the table, declaring them to be his first offering to the treasury.

This magnificent donation, which came in aid of their finances at a moment when such a recruit was very necessary, called forth loud shouts of applause from the freemen of the forest; and the Gros St. Nicolas starting up, addressed the company much to the following effect: "Messieurs—every one knows that I am St. Nicolas, and no one will deny that I am surrounded by a number of goodly clerks. But although in my saintly character I will give up my clerical superiority to nobody, yet it appears to me, that our society requires some lay commander; therefore I, your bishop, do propose to you to elect and choose the Sieur Marteville, here present, to be our king, and captain in the wars, in room of the Sieur Pierrepont La Blanc, who, having abdicated without cause, was committed to the custody of the great receiver-general—the earth, by warrant of cold iron and pistol-balls. What say ye, messieurs—shall he be elected?"

A shout of approbation was the reply; and Marteville having been duly elected, took the oaths, and received the homage of his new subjects. He then entered into a variety of plans for increasing the band, concentrating its operations, and once more rendering it that formidable body, which it had been in former times. All this met with the highest approbation; but the captain, showing the most marked dislike to remaining in the forest, which they at present tenanted, and producing a variety of reasons for moving their quarters to Languedoc, where the neighbourhood of the court and the army offered greater facilities both for recruiting their numbers and their purses, it was agreed that they should disperse the next morning, and re-assemble as soon as possible, at a certain spot well known to the whole party, about forty leagues distant from Lyons.

This was happily effected; and the Norman, on presenting himself at the rendezvous, had the pleasure of introducing to the band two new associates, whom he had found the means of converting on the road.

Although abandoning himself heart and soul to the pleasures of his resumed profession, our friend Marteville was not forgetful of the reward he expected from Chavigni; and as his official duties prevented his being himself the bearer of the paper he had obtained, he despatched it to Narbonne, where the statesman now was, by his faithful subject Callot, with orders to demand ten thousand crowns of Monsieur de Chavigni, as a reward for having discovered it, adding also an elaborate epistle to the same effect.

The Norman never for a moment entertained a suspicion that the paper he sent was any thing but the identical treaty with Spain, which the conspirators had been heard to mention; and he doubted not that the statesman would willingly pay such a sum for so precious a document. But the embassy of Monsieur Callot did not prove so fortunate as had been anticipated. Presenting himself to Chavigni, with as much importance of aspect as the ambassador from Siam, he tendered his credentials, and demanded the reward, at a moment when the statesman was irritated by a thousand anxieties and dangers.

Making no ceremony with the fine blue and yellow wax, Chavigni, having read the Norman's epistle, soon found his way into the inside of the other packet, and beheld in the midst of a thousand signs and figures, unintelligible to any but a professed astrologer, a prophetic scroll containing some doggrel verses, which may be thus rendered into English :—

THE FATE OF RICHELIEU.

Born beneath two mighty stars,
Mercury with Mars combined,
He shall prompt a thousand wars,
Nor live the balm of peace to find.

Less than a king, yet kings shall fall
And tremble at his fatal sway;
Yet at life's end he shall recall
The memory of no happy day.

And the last year that he shall know,
Shall see him fall, and see him rise,
Shall see him yield, yet slay his foe,
And scarcely triumph ere he dies.

Begot in factions, nursed in strife,
Till all his troubled years be past,
Cunning and care eat up his life,—
A slave and tyrant, first and last.

PÈRE LE ROUGE.

Chavigni gazed at the paper in amazement, and then at the face of Monsieur Callot, who, totally unconscious of the contents, remained very nonchalantly expecting the reward. "Ten thousand crowns!" cried the statesman, giving way to his passion. "Ho! without there! take this fellow out and flog him with your hunting-whips out of Narbonne. Away with him, and curry him well!"

The grooms instantly seized upon poor Callot, and executed Chavigni's commands with high glee. The robber, however, though somewhat surprised, bore his flagellation very patiently; for under the jerkin which he wore, still lay the rusty iron corslet we have before described, which saved him from appreciating the blows at their full value.

The matter, however, was yet to be remembered, as we shall see; for when Callot, on his return to the forest, informed his captain what sort of reward he had received for the packet, the Norman's gigantic limbs seemed to swell to a still greater size with passion, and drawing his sword, he put the blade to his lips, swearing, that before twelve months were over, it should drink Chavigni's blood: and promises of such sort he usually kept most punctually.

CHAPTER XXXI.

HAVING now conducted our truly-begotten friend, the Sieur Marteville, considerably in advance of the rest of the characters in this true history, it becomes us to show our impartiality by detailing the principal actions of our other personages, and also to display the causes which brought the noble Count de Chavigni to such a distance as Narbonne, a little town in the southern nook of Languedoc, not above a few leagues from Perpignan. However, as all these circumstances are naturally explained in the history of the Count de Blénau, we may as well follow him on the useless pursuit into which he has been led by the precipitancy of Monsieur Henry de la Mothe, his page, who would have saved his master a great deal of trouble and distress, as we all know, if he had thought fit to see the Marquise de Beaumont; but young hounds will often cry upon a wrong scent, and mislead those who should know better.

Thus it happened in the present instance; and De Blénau, blinded by anxiety for Pauline, took the suspicions of his page for granted, without examination. He knew that Chavigni scrupled not at any measures which might serve a political purpose; he knew that the Norman was in the immediate employment of the statesman, and was still less delicate in his notions than his master; and he doubted not that Pauline, having been discovered issuing from the Bastille, had been carried off without ceremony, and sent from Paris under the custody of the ci-devant robber. At all events, De Blénau, as he rode along, composed a very plausible chain of reasoning upon the subject; and far from supposing that the Norman would avoid the wood in the neighbourhood of Mesnil, he concluded, from his knowledge of Marteville's former habits, that a forest filled with robbers would fulfil all his anticipations of Paradise, and be too strong an attraction to be resisted.

Thus cogitating, he rode on to Decize, and thence to Corbigny, where day once more broke upon his path; and having been obliged to allow the horses a few hours' rest, he tried in vain for some repose himself. Auxerre was his next halt; but here only granting his domestics one hour to refresh, he passed the Yonne, and soon after entered Champagne, which traversing without stopping, except for a few minutes at Bar sur Seine, he reached Troyes before midnight, with man and horse too wearied to begin their search before the following morning.

It unluckily so happened that De Blénau did not alight at the hotel of the Grand Soleil, where he might have gained such information as would in all probability have prevented his further proceedings ; and, as the keeper of the auberge where he stopped was at open war with the landlord of the Grand Soleil, to all the inquiries which were made the next morning, the only reply the aubergiste thought fit to give was, that " indeed he could not tell ; he had never seen such a person as De Blénau described the Norman to be, or such a lady as Pauline ;"—though, be it remarked, every body in the house, after having gazed at Marteville and Louise for a full hour on their arrival, had watched their motions every day, and had wondered themselves stiff at who they could be and what they could want. At length, however, De Blénau caught hold of an unsophisticated hostler, of whom he asked if within the last ten days he had seen a carriage stop or pass through the town containing two such persons as he described.

The hostler replied, " No ; that they seldom saw carriages there ; that a tall gentleman, like the one he mentioned, had ridden out of the town just two days before with a lady on horseback ; but devil a carriage had there been in Troyes for six years or more, except that of Monseigneur the Governor."

De Blénau, glad of the least intimation where news seemed so scanty, now described the Norman as particularly as he could, from what he had seen of him while speaking to Chavigni in the park of St. Germain, dwelling upon his gigantic proportions, and the remarkable cut upon his cheek.

" Yes, yes !" replied the hostler, " that was the man ; I saw him ride out with a jolie demoiselle on the road to Mesnil St. Loup ; but devil a carriage has there been in Troyes for six years or more, except that of Monseigneur the Governor."

" Well, well," replied De Blénau, wishing if possible to hear more, " perhaps they might not be in a carriage. But can you tell me where they lodged while in the city of Troyes ?"

Even the obtuse faculties of the hostler had been drilled into knowing nothing of any other auberge in the town but his own. " Can't tell," replied he. " Saw him and the lady ride out on horseback ; but devil a carriage has there been in Troyes for six years or more, except that of Monseigneur the Governor."

It may have been remarked, that a certain degree of impatience and hastiness of determination was one of the prevailing faults of De Blénau's disposition; and in this case, without waiting for further examination, he set out in pursuit of the Norman as soon as his horses were ready, merely inquiring if there was any castle in the neighbourhood of Mesnil which might serve for the confinement of state prisoners.

The landlord, to whom the question was addressed, immediately determined in his own mind, that De Blénau was an agent of the government; and replied, "None, that he knew of, but the old château of St. Loup; but that monseigneur had better have it repaired before he confined any one there, for it was so ruinous they would get out, to a certainty, if they were placed there in its present state."

De Blénau smiled at the mistake, but prepossessed with the idea that the Norman was carrying Pauline to some place of secret imprisonment, he determined at once to proceed to the spot the aubergiste mentioned, and to traverse the wood from the high-road to Troyes, as the most likely route on which to encounter the Norman, against whom he vowed the most summary vengeance, if fortune should afford him the opportunity.

As, from every report upon the subject, the forest had been for some time past the resort of banditti, De Blénau gave orders to his servants to hold themselves upon their guard, and took the precaution of throwing forward two of his shrewdest followers, as a sort of reconnoitring party, to give him intelligence of the least noise which could indicate the presence of any human being besides themselves. But all these measures seemed to be unnecessary; not a sound met the ear; and De Blénau's party soon began to catch glimpses of the old château of St. Loup, through the breaks in the wood; and gradually winding round towards the east, gained the slope which gave them a clear view of the whole building.

The whole appearance of the place was so desolate and dilapidated, that the first glance convinced De Blénau that Chavigni would never dream of confining Pauline within such ruinous walls ; as the mere consideration of her rank would prevent him from using any unnecessary severity, though her successful attempt to penetrate into the Bastille afforded a plausible excuse for removing her from Paris. However, in order not to leave the least doubt upon the subject, he mounted to the courtyard, and having ascertained that every part of the building was equally unfit for the purposes of a prison, and that it was actually uninhabited except by owls and ravens, he determined to cross to a town, the spire of whose church he saw rising on the opposite hill, and to pursue his search in some other direction.

Descending, therefore, by the same slope which he had previously mounted, he wound round the base of the hill much in the same path by which Callot had conducted the Norman and Louise. The stream, however, formed the boundary of his approach to the castle on that side ; and passing the rocks which we have already mentioned as strewn about at the foot of the precipices, he followed the course of the river, till, winding into the wood, the castle, and the hill on which it stood, were lost to the sight. Here as he rode slowly on, revolving various plans for more successfully pursuing the Norman, and reproaching himself for not having made more accurate inquiries at Troyes, his eye was suddenly attracted by the appearance of something floating on the river like the long black hair of a young woman.

De Blénau's heart sunk within him : his courage failed, his whole strength seemed to give way, and he sat upon his horse like a statue, pointing with his hand towards the object that had thus affected him, but without the power of uttering any order concerning it.

In the mean while the hair waved slowly backwards and forwards upon the stream, and one of the servants perceiving it, dismounted from his horse, waded into the water, and catching it in his grasp, began dragging the body to which it was attached towards the brink. As he did so, the part of a red serge dress, such as that in which Pauline had visited the Bastille, floated to the surface, and offered a horrible confirmation of De Blénau's fears. The first shock, however, was passed, and leaping from his horse with agony depicted in his straining eye, he sprang down the bank into the stream, and raising the face of the dead person above the water, beheld the countenance of Louise.

Perhaps the immoderate joy which De Blénau felt at this sight might be wrong, but it was natural ; and sitting down on the bank, he covered his face with his hands, overcome by the violent revolution of feeling which so suddenly took place in his bosom.

In the mean while his servants drew the body of the unfortunate girl to the bank, and speedily discovered that the mode of her death had been of a more horrible description than even that which they had at first supposed : for in her bosom appeared a deep broad gash as if from the blow of a poniard, which had undoubtedly deprived her of life before her murderer committed the body to the stream.

According to the costume of her country, Louise had worn upon the day of her death two large white pockets above the jupe of red serge. These were still attached to the black velvet bodice which she displayed in honour of her marriage with the Norman, and contained a variety of miscellaneous articles, amongst which were several epistles from her husband to herself in the days of their courtship, which showed De Blénau that she had been employed as a spy upon Pauline and Madame de Beaumont ever since their arrival at St. Germain : added to these was a certificate of marriage between Jean Baptiste Marteville and Louise Thibault, celebrated in the chapel of the Palais Cardinal, by François Giraud. All this led De Blénau to conclude that he had been misled in regard to the cause of Pauline's absence from St. Germain ; and he accordingly proceeded to the little bourg of Senecy, on his return towards Troyes, making his men bear thither the body of Louise, with as much decent solemnity as the circumstances admitted. Having here intrusted to the good curé of the place the charge of the funeral, and given two sums for the very different purposes of promoting the discovery of the murderer, and buying a hundred masses for the soul of the deceased, De Blénau pursued his journey, and arrived at Troyes before night.

Putting up this time at the hotel of the Grand Soleil, De Blénau soon acquired sufficient information to confirm him in the opinion that the Norman had been accompanied by Louise alone ; but, at the same time, the accounts which the people of the house gave respecting the kindness and affection that Marteville had shown his bride, greatly shook the suspicions which had been entertained against him by De Blénau, who, unacquainted with any such character as that of the Norman, knew not that there are men who, like tigers when unurged by hunger, will play with their victims before they destroy them.

The next morning early, all was prepared for the departure of De Blénau, on his return to Moulins, when his further progress in that direction was arrested by the arrival of Henry de la Mothe, his page, accompanied by one of the king's couriers, who immediately presented to the count two packets, of which he had been the bearer from St. Germain. The first of these seemed, from the superscription, to be a common official document ; but the second attracted all his attention, and made his heart beat high, by presenting to him the genuine handwriting of Pauline de Beaumont. Without meaning any offence to royalty, whose insignia were impressed upon the seal of the other packet, De Blénau eagerly cut the silk which fastened the billet from Pauline. It contained only a few lines, but these were quite sufficient to give renewed happiness to the heart of him who read it. She had just heard, she said, that the king's messenger was about to set out, and though they hardly gave her time to fold her paper, yet she would not let any one be before her in congratulating him on his freedom to direct his course where-soever he pleased. She could not divine, she continued, whether his choice would lead him to St. Germain, but if it did, perhaps he might be treated to the history of an errant demoiselle, who had suffered various adventures in endeavouring to liberate her true knight from prison.

De Blénau read it over again, and then turned to the other paper, which merely notified that the king, contented with his loyal and peaceable behaviour while relégué in Bourbon, had been graciously pleased to relieve him from the restrictions under which he had been placed for his own benefit and the state's security; and informed him, in short, that he had leave, liberty, and licence to turn his steps whithersoever he listed.

"To St. Germain!" cried De Blénau, gaily. "To St. Germain! You, Henry de la Mothe, stay here with François and Clement. Take good care of Monsieur l'Ordinaire, and see that he be rewarded."—The messenger made his reverence.—"After you have reposed yourself here for a day," continued the count, "return to Moulins; pay notre propriétaire, and all that may be there due. There is the key of the coffre fort. Use all speed that you well may, and then join me at home. And now for St. Germain!"

So saying, he sprang on his horse as light as air, gave the well-known signal with his heel, and in a moment was once more on the road to Paris.

Although I find a minute account of De Blénau's whole journey to St. Germain, with the towns and inns at which he stopped, marked with the precision of a road-book, I shall nevertheless take upon myself the responsibility of abridging it, as far as well can be, by saying that it began and ended happily.

The aspect of St. Germain, however, had very much changed since De Blénau left it. Louis had now fixed his residence there; his confidence in the queen seemed perfectly restored; every countenance glowed with that air of satisfaction which such a renewal of good intelligence naturally produced; and the royal residence had once more assumed the appearance of a court.

The first welcome received by De Blénau was from his gallant friend Cinq Mars, at whose request his recall had been granted by the king, and who now, calculating the time of the exile's return, stood at the door of De Blénau's hotel, ready to meet him on his arrival.

"Welcome, welcome back! my long-lost friend, Claude de Blénau!" exclaimed Cinq Mars, as the count sprang from his horse; "welcome from the midst of prisons and trials, perils and dangers!"

"And well met, gallant Cinq Mars, the noble and the true!" replied De Blénau. "But tell me, in heaven's name, Cinq Mars, what makes all this change at St. Germain? Why, it looks as if the forest were a fair, and that the old town had put on its holiday suit to come and see it."

"Nay, nay, rather like a true dame that dresses herself out for her lover's return, it has made itself fine to receive you back again," replied the master of the horse. "But if you would really know the secret of all the change that you see now, and will see still more wonderfully as you look further, it is this: Richelieu is ill at Tarascon, and his name is scarcely remembered at the court, though Chavigni, that bold rascal, and Mazarin, that subtle one, come prowling about to maintain, if possible, their master's sway. But the spell is broken, and Louis is beginning to be a king again; so we shall see bright days yet."

"I hope so, in truth I hope so, Cinq Mars," replied De Blénau; "but, at all events, we will enjoy the change so far as it has gone. And now, what news at the palace? How fare all the lovely ladies of the court?"

"Why, well," answered Cinq Mars; "all well; though I know, De Blénau, that your question, in comprising a hundred, meant but one only. Well, what say you? I have seen thy Pauline, and cannot but allow that thy taste is marvellous good. There is a wild grace about her well worth all the formal dignity of a court. One gets tired of the stiff courtesy and the precise bow, the kissing of hands and the lisping of names, the Monseigneurings and Madamings. Fie! one little touch of nature is worth it all."

"But answer me one question, Monsieur le Grand," said De Blénau. "How came there a report about, that Pauline had been carried off by some of the cardinal's people, and that no one knew where she was? for such a tale reached me even in Bourbon."

"Is it possible that you are the last to hear that story?" exclaimed Cinq Mars. "Why, though the old marquise and the rest at the palace, affect to keep it a secret, every one knows the adventures of your demoiselle errante."

De Blénau's cheek flushed to hear such a name applied to Pauline ; but Cinq Mars continued, observing that his friend was hurt—"Nay, nay, every one admires her for the whole business, and no one more than I. But, as I was saying, all the world knows it. The queen herself told it to Monsieur de Lomenie, and he to his cousin De Thou, and De Thou to me ; and so it goes on. Well, but I must take up the gossip's tale at the beginning. The queen, wishing to communicate with you in prison, could find no messenger who, for either gold or fair words, would venture his head into the rat-trap, except your fair Pauline ; and she, it seems, attempted twice to get into the Bastille, once by day, and once at night, but both times fruitlessly. How it happened I hardly remember, but by some means Chavigni, through some of his creatures, winded the whole affair ; and posting from Chantilly to Paris, catches my fair lady in the very effort, disguised as a soubrette. Down he pounces, like a falcon on a partridge, and having secured the delinquent, places her in a carriage, which, with the speed of light, conveys her away to his castle in Maine, where Madame la Comtesse de Chavigni—who, by the way, is an angel, according to all accounts—receives the young lady, and entertains her with all kindness. In the mean while, Monsieur le Count de Blénau is examined by the king in person, and instead of having his head cut off, is merely relégué in Bourbon ; upon which Chavigni finds he has lost his labour, and is obliged to send for the pretty prisoner back again with all speed."

Although De Blénau was aware, from his own personal experience, that Cinq Mars had mistaken several parts of his history, he did not think fit to set him right, and the master of the horse proceeded : "However, let us into thy hotel. Get thy dinner, wash the dust from thy beard, array thyself in an unsullied doublet, and we will hie to the dwelling of thy lady fair, to glad her eyes with the sight of thy sweet person."

De Blénau smiled at his friend's raillery, and as the proposal very well accorded with his wishes, every moment seeming misspent that detained him from Pauline, he changed his dress as speedily as possible, and was soon ready to accompany Cinq Mars to the palace.

As they proceeded on their way towards the gates of the park, a figure presented itself which, from its singularity, was worthy of notice. It was that of a tall, thin, raw-boned man, who, naturally possessing a countenance of the ugliest cast of Italian ugliness, had rendered it still more disagreeable by the enormous length of his mustaches, which would have far overtopped his nose, had it been a nose of any ordinary proportion; but a more extensive, pear-shaped, ill-adapted organ never projected from a human countenance; and this, together with a pair of small, flaming black eyes, which it seemed to bear forward with it above the rest of the face, protruding from a mass of beard and hair, instantly reminding the beholder of a badger looking out of a hole. The chin, however, bore no proportion to the nose, and seemed rather to slink away from it in an oblique direction, apparently overawed by its more ambitious neighbour. The dress of the delectable personage was a medley of the French and Flemish costumes. He wore a gray vest of silk, with sleeves slashed at the elbow, and the shirt, which was not conspicuously clean, buttoned at the wrist with agate studs. His haut de chausse, which was of deep crimson, and bore loops and ribbons of yellow, was fringed round the leg, near the knees, with a series of brazen tags or points, but indifferently silvered; and as he walked along with huge steps, these aforesaid tags clattered together with a sort of important sound, which, put in combination with the rest of his appearance, drew many a laugh from the boys of St. Germain. Over his gray vest was drawn a straight-cut doublet of yellow silk, without sleeves; and a pair of long boots, of untanned leather, covered all defects which might otherwise have been apparent in his hose. His dress was completed by a tawdry bonnet, with a high black plume; and a Toledo blade, of immeasurable length, with a worked iron hilt and a black scabbard, hung by his side, describing, with its point, various strange figures on the dust of the road.

"Here comes Villa Grande, the Italian lute-player," exclaimed Cinq Mars, the moment he saw him. "Do you know him, De Blè nau?"

"I have heard him play on his instrument and sing at your house," replied De Blè nau; "and, from his language that night, may say I know him through and through for a boasting coxcomb, with as much courage as the sheath of a rapier,—which looks as good as a rapier itself till it is touched, and then it proves all emptiness. Mind you how he boasted of having routed whole squadrons when he served in the Italian horse? and I dare say he would run from a stuffed pikeman in an old hall."

"Nay, nay, you do him wrong, Claude," replied Cinq Mars: "he has rather too much tongue, it is true; but that is not always the sign of a bad hound. I must speak to him, however, for he does me service.—Well, Signor Villa Grande," continued he, addressing the Italian, who now approached, swinging an enormous cane in his hand, and from time to time curling up the ends of his mustaches: "you remember that you are to be ready at a moment's notice. Be sure, also, that your mind be made up; for I tell you fairly, the service which you undertake is one of danger."

"Monsieur," replied the Italian, with a strong foreign accent, "I will be ready when you call upon me, in shorter time than you could draw your sword; and as for my mind being made up, if there were an army drawn out to oppose my progress, I would be bound to carry the despatch to the Duke of Bouillon, or die in the attempt. Fear not my yielding it to any body; piuttosto morir volio, as the song has it," and he hummed a few bars of one of his native airs. "Oh Dio!" continued he, recognising De Blè nau, who had turned away on perceiving that Cinq Mars spoke to the Italian on some business of a private nature. "Oh Dio! Monsieur le Comte de Blè nau, is it really you returned at last? Benedetto quel giorno felice! Doubtless you are aware of the glorious plans of your friend Monsieur le Grand."

"Good day, signor," answered De Blénau; "I know of no one's plans but my own, the most glorious of which, within my apprehension at present, is to get to the palace as soon as possible. Come, Cinq Mars, are you at leisure?" and he took a step or two in advance, while the master of the horse gave the Italian a warning to put a bridle on his tongue, and not to let it run so loosely for the future.

"For heaven's sake, take care what you are about, Cinq Mars!" said De Blénau, when he was again joined by his friend. "Of course, you are the best judge of your own plans; but unless you have a mind to ruin them all, do not trust to such a babbling idiot as that; and beware that, in attempting to catch a lion, you do not get torn yourself."

"Oh! no fear," replied the grand écuyer; "that fellow knows nothing more than it is absolutely necessary for him to know; and as for the rest, I have plunged into a wide sea, Claude, and must swim to land somehow."

They had by this time reached the gates of the palace, and Cinq Mars, knowing that some meetings are better in private, left his friend, and turned his steps towards the apartments of the king.

In the mean while, D. Blénau, proceeded with a rapid pace towards that part of the palace which had been assigned to Madame de Beaumont; and his heart beat with that wild uncontrollable emotion which the meeting with one dearly loved can alone produce. At that very moment similar sensations were throbbing in the bosom of Pauline de Beaumont, who, from the window, had seen the approach of Cinq Mars and another; and long before her eye could distinguish a feature, her heart had told her who it was. A sort of irresistible impulse led her, at first, to fly towards the door by which she expected him to enter; but before she was half across the room, some other feeling came over her mind. She returned to her seat at the window, and a blush stole over her cheek, though there was no other person present to observe her emotion or pry into its cause.

The door was partially open, and more than once she raised her eyes towards it, and thought that De Blénau was long in coming so short a distance. But presently she heard his step, and there was an impatient eagerness even in the sound of his footfall that convinced her he lost no time. Another moment, and he entered the room—every feeling; but one was at an end, and Pauline was in his arms.

It is not at the moment when a lover has endured many sorrows, and escaped from many dangers, that a gentle heart can practise even the every-day affectations which a great part of the world are pleased to mistake for delicacy; and far less inclined to attempt it than any other person in the world, was Pauline de Beaumont. The child of nature and simplicity, her delicacy was that of an elegant mind and a pure heart. Of what she did feel she concealed little, and affected nothing; and De Blénau was happy.

Of course, there was a great deal to be told, and De Blénau was listening delighted to an account of the considerate kindness with which the Countess de Chavigny had treated his Pauline, when the sound of voices approaching towards them, stopped her in her history.

It is precisely at such moments as those when we wish every body but ourselves away, that the world is most likely to intrude upon us; and Pauline and De Blénau had not met more than five minutes, as it seemed to them, when the queen and Madame de Beaumont entered the apartment. How long they had been really together is another thing, for lovers' feelings are not always the truest watches.

"Welcome, my faithful De Blénau," said the queen. "We encountered the grand écuyer but now, who told us where we should find you. For my own part, I suppose I must, in all justice, forgive your paying your devoirs here before you came to visit even me. However, ere there be any one near to overhear, I must thank you for all you have done for me, and for all you have suffered on my account. Nor must I forget my little heroine here, who went through all sorts of peril and danger in conveying my message to you in the Bastille."

"Your majesty was very good in sending me such an angel of comfort," replied De Blè nau. "And certainly, had it not been for the commands she brought me, I believe that his most Christian-like Eminence of Richelieu would have doomed me to the torture for my obstinacy."

"Put it in other words, De Blè nau," said Anne of Austria. "You mean that you would have endured the torture sooner than betray your queen. But, truly, Pauline must have a stout heart to have carried through such an undertaking; and I think that the fidelity and attachment which you have both shown to me, offers a fair promise for your conduct towards each other. What say you, Madame de Beaumont?"

"I think, madam," replied the marchioness, "that Pauline has done her duty with more firmness than most girls could have commanded; and that De Blè nau has done his as well as it could be done."

"Pauline merits more praise than her mother ventures to give," said the queen. "But I forgot the king's summons; and probably he is even now waiting for us. Come, Pauline; come, De Blè nau. Louis gives high commendation to your demeanour in prison; let us see how he greets you out of it."

A message had been conveyed to Anne of Austria, just before the arrival of De Blè nau, intimating that the king desired to see her; and she now led the way to the Salle Ronde, as it was then called, or the Salle des Muses, as it was afterwards named by Louis the Fourteenth, where the king waited her approach. Although the uncertain nature of Louis's temper always made her feel some degree of apprehension when summoned to his presence, the kindness he had lately shown her, and the presence of a large proportion of her friends, made her obey his call with more pleasure than she usually felt on similar occasions.

Louis's object, in the present instance, was to inform the queen of the journey he was about to make into the neighbourhood of Perpignan, in order to confirm the inhabitants of Roussillon in their new allegiance to the crown of France; and Cinq Mars, who had always sincerely wished the welfare of Anne of Austria, took this opportunity of insinuating to the king, that to show publicly his restored confidence in the queen, so far from lessening his authority, even in appearance, would be in truth only asserting his own dignity, from which the proceedings of Richelieu had so greatly derogated.

De Blénau and Pauline followed a step or two behind the queen and Madame de Beaumont, and would willingly have lingered still longer by themselves; but as something must always be sacrificed to appearance, they quickened their pace as Anne of Austria approached the door of the Salle Ronde, and came up with her just as she entered the room, in which the principal part of the French court were assembled. The moment she appeared, Louis advanced towards the queen from the brilliant circle in which he stood, and embraced her affectionately. "Welcome, my fair lady," said he. "I see you have brought the new returned exile with you.—Monsieur de Blénau, I am glad to see you at court;—this is a pleasanter place than where we met last."

"I can assure you, sire," replied De Blénau, "that I will never be willingly in circumstances to meet your majesty there again."

"I do not doubt it, I do not doubt it," said the king. "You should thank Heaven that delivered you from such peril, sir count.—Madam," he continued, turning to the queen, "I requested to see you, not only for the pleasure which your presence must always give, but to inform you, that affairs of state will shortly call me to Narbonne, in Languedoc, from whence I shall return with all convenient speed."

"Your majesty soon leaves St. Germain," replied the queen. "I do not think you love it for a sojourn, as in other days."

"Not so," answered Louis; "so well do I love it, that I had purposed to have worn out the rest of my days here, had not the duties of my station called me hence: but my return will be speedy if God give me life.—What man can say how long he may remain? and I feel many warning that my time will be but short in this world.—

Ha! what mean those drops in your eyes?—I did not know, Anne, that such were your feelings.” And he pressed the queen’s hand, which he had continued to retain in his.

“Oh, Louis!” replied Anne of Austria, and by that simple exclamation conveyed a more delicate reproach to the heart of her husband than she could have done by any other expression in the range of language. Louis felt it, and drawing her arm kindly through his own, he proposed aloud that the whole party should walk forth upon the terrace. It was the queen’s favourite spot, and she easily understood that it was meant as some atonement for many a former slight. Those, too, who stood round and saw what had taken place, began to perceive that a new star was dawning in the horizon, and turned their eyes to watch its progress and court its influence.

The king and queen were followed by the greater part of the court: and during the walk, Louis continued to manifest that kindness towards his wife, which, had it been earlier shown, might have given him a life of happiness. “Let me beg you, madam,” said he, as at length they turned to enter the palace, “not only to be careful of our children, for that I am sure you will be, but also to be careful of their mother, for my sake.”

The queen’s feelings were overpowering; the tears rolled rapidly down her cheeks, taking from her all power of utterance, and quitting the king, after pressing his hand to her lips, she retired to her own apartments, to indulge in solitude the new and delightful emotions which her husband’s unexpected kindness had excited.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE various preparations for the king’s journey into Roussillon occupied no small space of time. Litters and carriages were to be provided; relays of horses to be stationed on the road; cooks and victuallers were to be sent forward ; and a thousand other arrangements to be made, required either by the general difficulty of locomotion in those days, or by the failing health of the king. It was not then, as in the present time, when monarchs and subjects travel with equal facility all over the globe : when a king gets into his travelling-chaise with no more to do than a private man, and is carried along over a level road without let or hindrance, jolt or jumbling, to whatsoever place his fancy may incline him. The journey of a sovereign was then as formidable an undertaking as the passage of the Great Desert to a modern traveller, and required fully as much provision and circumspection.

One great object of Richelieu's policy had been to diminish the feudal influence of the nobility, and by forcing them to reside with the court, to break through their constant communication with their vassals. In pursuit of this, he had drawn the greater part of the nobles to Paris ; and now that his absence and declining favour with the king dissolved the charm which seemed to hold them in the capital, they congregated at St. Germain like a flock of bees, that, having lost their hive, flew forth in search of a new one. Many of these were bound, by their various offices in the household, to accompany the king in his present journey ; others were particularly invited to do so either by Louis himself or by Cinq Mars and Fontrailles, who sought to surround the king with those who, on any sudden emergency, might support their party against the cardinal ; and a crowd of others, from vanity or interest, curiosity or ambition, were glad to follow in the train of the monarch.

Thus the greater part of the nobles who had flocked to St. Germain, on Richelieu's departure for Paris, now again left it in order to take part in the journey to Narbonne. As all the horses, and every sort of accommodation on the direct road, were engaged for the service of the king and those immediately attendant upon him, the greater part of the court proceeded by the indirect roads by which they could always be near the royal party ; and the rest followed a day or two after, taking advantage of whatever conveniences might be left unappropriated.

There were one or two, however, who departed before Louis, and of these the principal was Chavigni, who set out, accompanied by a few servants, two or three days prior to that appointed for the king's expedition. His ostensible destination was, like that of the rest of the court, to Narbonne; but turning to the left, he directed his course towards Tarascon, and having travelled with the utmost rapidity, while Louis journeyed by easy stages, he had quite sufficient time to communicate fully with Richelieu, and to proceed to Narbonne before the king's arrival.

The expedition into Roussillon had been undertaken by the express advice of Richelieu; and though Cinq Mars ventured boldly to attack the conduct of the cardinal in every respect, to place all his measures in the worst point of view, and to encourage every sentiment in the king's mind which was in opposition to those of the minister, still no change, or even a proposal of change, in the government had been mentioned, up to the time of the court reaching Narbonne. Richelieu was still prime minister, and the council remained composed of persons devoted to his interest, though the views of Cinq Mars were already spoken of in more than one circle, and the consent of the king was so far assumed as a matter decided, that the two parties were distinguished by the names of Royalist and Cardinalist.

While the court remained with the army near Perpignan, and after its removal to Narbonne, Richelieu still lay dangerously ill at Tarascon. His mind was deeply depressed, as well as his corporeal powers, and in the opinion of all, a few weeks were likely to terminate both his ministry and his existence, even if the eager hand of his enemies did not hurry him onward to more rapid destruction. But the fiery spirit of Cinq Mars brooked no delay: the lazy course of natural decay was too slow for his impatience; and though De Thou, who accompanied his friend to Narbonne, reiterated in his ears the maxims of caution and wisdom, on the other hand Fontrailles, fearful lest he should lose the merit and consequent influence he should acquire by the removal of Richelieu, never ceased to urge the favourite to hurry on the completion of their design.

In the mean time, every thing seemed favourable to the conspirators; and Cinq Mars felt confident that the secret inclination of Louis would second all his views; but, nevertheless, he wished for some more public and determinate expression of the king's opinion, before he asked his consent to the measures which had been concerted. After the arrival of the court at Narbonne, however, the monarch's conduct in respect to Richelieu became of so decisive a character, that no further delay appeared necessary. Within a few miles of the place where the cardinal lay ill, the king seemed entirely to have forgotten that such a man existed, or only to remember him with hatred. His name, if it was ever mentioned, instantly called into Louis's countenance an expression of uneasiness and disapprobation; and by no chance was the king ever heard to pronounce it himself. By all these circumstances, Cinq Mars was determined to communicate to Louis, as soon as possible, the schemes which had been formed for freeing the country from the yoke of Richelieu. He suffered, however, several days to elapse in waiting for a favourable opportunity, and at length, as often happens, growing impatient of delay, took perhaps the most inauspicious moment that could have been selected. It was on a morning when every thing had gone wrong with Louis.

Notwithstanding his failing health, he still clung to his accustomed amusements, and very often rode forth to hunt when he was very unfit for any bodily exercise. On these occasions, the distressing consciousness of his decaying powers always rendered him doubly irritable; and on the day which Cinq Mars unfortunately chose to broach the subject of the dismissal of Richelieu, a thousand trivial accidents had occurred to increase his ill humour to the highest pitch. His horse had fallen with him in the chase; they had beat the country for hours without finding any game worthy of pursuit; and when at length they did rouse a fine boar, and had brought him to bay, he broke out after killing two of the king's best hounds, and plunged into the deepest part of the forest. Louis was returning home from this unsuccessful chase, when Cinq Mars, turning his eyes towards the towers of Tarascon, which just then were seen rising above the trees in the distance, pointed to them with his hunting-whip, saying, "There lies the cardinal!"

"Well, sir," exclaimed Louis eagerly, catching at any thing on which to vent his irritability, "do you wish me to go and see him? Doubtless he will be glad of the visit. Let us go." And he reined in his horse, as if with the intention of turning him towards Tarascon.

"Far be it from me to advise your majesty so to do," replied Cinq Mars, who clearly perceived that the king's answer proceeded only from casual irritation. "It was the sight of the old towers of the château, that called the cardinal to my mind. In truth, I had almost forgotten him."

"Forgotten him, Cinq Mars?" cried the king. "I think he has done enough to make himself remembered."

"He has indeed, sire," replied Cinq Mars, "and his memory will long last coupled with curses in the heart of every true Frenchman. But there he lies; I trust, like the Tarasque, hideous but harmless, for the present."

"What do you mean by the Tarasque?" demanded Louis; "I never heard of it."

"It is merely a whimsical stone dragon, sire," replied Cinq Mars, "that lies carved in the church of St. Marthe, on the Rhone—a thing of no more real use than the Cardinal de Richelieu."

"Of no use, sir!" exclaimed the king, his eye flashing fire. "Do you think that we would repose such trust, and confide our kingdom's weal to one who is of no use? Silence, sir!" he continued, seeing Cinq Mars about to reply: "no more of this subject, we have heard too much of it."

Cinq Mars was too wise to add another word, and the king rode on to Narbonne, maintaining a sullen silence towards all around him.

Of the conversation which had passed not one word had escaped the ears of Fontrailles; and the moment the cortège had dismounted, he followed the master of the horse towards a distant part of the grounds which lay behind the château. Cinq Mars walked on as if he did not see him, and at last finding that he persisted in following, he stopped abruptly, exclaiming, "Well, Fontrailles, well! what now? What would you say? I can guess it all, so spare yourself the trouble."

"You mistake me, Cinq Mars," replied Fontrailles, "if you think I would blame you. You did your best, though the time was not the best chosen; but all I wish to press upon you is, not to let this dispirit you. Let the subject die away for the present and seem forgotten, till the king is in a better mood. Every hour of his neglect is death to Richelieu; and, besides, the king's consent is not absolutely necessary to us."

"To me, absolutely necessary," replied Cinq Mars, "for I stir not one step without it."

"Nay, the king's private consent to you is of course necessary," answered Fontrailles; "but you surely do not think of informing him of the treaty with Spain? After the affair is finished, and Richelieu's power at an end, Louis will see the necessity of it; but such, you must know, is his hatred towards Spain, that he would consider the very proposal as little better than high treason."

"I am not yet determined in that respect," answered Cinq Mars; "my conduct will of course be decided by how I find the king inclined. I like no concealments, where they can be avoided. But in the first place, Villa Grande must carry the treaty to——"

Cinq Mars paused; for as he spoke Chavigni turned sharp round from an alley close by, and passed on. The statesman bowed, en passant, to the master of the horse, who but slightly returned his salutation, while, on the other hand, Fontrailles doffed his hat and inclined his head with a hypocritical smile, in which habitual servility was strongly blended with triumphant malice.

Chavigni spoke not, but there were two or three words had caught his ear as he passed, which at once turned his suspicions into the right channel, and stimulated him to know more. We have already said that it was a maxim with the statesman, that in politics nothing is mean; and he would have felt not the slightest hesitation in listening to the conversation of Cinq Mars, could he have done so without being observed. To effect this, it was necessary to take a large round in order to approach the alley in which the two conspirators walked without drawing their attention to himself; but as he turned to do so, he observed the master of the horse separate from his companion and come towards the spot where he stood, and not wishing to put Cinq Mars on his guard, by showing that he was watched, he turned away and directed his steps towards the château.

"Must carry the treaty!" thought Chavigni. "Who must carry the treaty? If I could but have heard that name, I should then have had the clue in my hands. However, Monsieur de Cinq Mars, you shall be well looked to, at least;—take care that you trip not—for if you do, you fall." Thus thinking, he passed on to the stables, where his horses stood, intending, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, and the failing light, to ride over to Tarascon and communicate with Richelieu, even if he should be obliged to become a borrower of the night for a dark hour or twain. His grooms, however, taking advantage of his absence, had dispersed themselves in various directions in search of amusement to pass the hours in the dull town of Narbonne; and consequently Chavigni could find no one to saddle his horses for the proposed journey.

Irritated at this impediment, he was about to quit the stable in search of some of the truant grooms, when he again perceived Cinq Mars approaching, accompanied by the Italian Villa Grande. They were in earnest conversation, and Chavigni, knowing that Cinq Mars had horses lodged next to his own, drew back, and searching for a crevice in the wooden partition, which was as old and decayed as he could desire, he applied himself to listen to all that passed as soon as the master of the horse and his companion entered the adjoining stable. The first words he heard were from the Italian. "You know, monseigneur, neur," said he, "that the utmost a man can do is to die in defence of his charge; and that will I do, sooner than yield to any man that which you intrust to my hands."

"Well, well," replied Cinq Mars, "there is no need of so many professions, good sir. To-morrow morning then, at daybreak, you set out. That is the horse—mind you use him well, but spare not his speed. Salute the noble duke on my part with all kindness and love. At nine you come for the treaty: but mark that you keep your time, for at ten I must be with the king."

"But, monseigneur, monseigneur!" cried Villa Grande, as Cinq Mars turned to leave him, "perhaps your lackeys will not let me have the horse."

"Well, then, when you come to-night," replied the grand écuyer, "you shall have an order for him."

"Now then, your secret is in my power," thought Chavigni, as Cinq Mars and his companion left the spot. "Monsieur de Villa Grande, I will instantly make out an order for your arrest to-morrow morning, and save you the trouble of your journey.—Salute the noble duke!" he continued, meditating on the words of Cinq Mars.—"What duke?—It must be Gaston of Orleans.—But he is a royal duke.—But we shall see." And as he walked on towards the château he bent his eyes upon the ground, revolving in his mind the various plans which suggested themselves for withdrawing his patron and himself from the brink of that political precipice on which they stood.

His thoughts, however, which for a moment wandered to every different circumstance of his situation, seeking, amongst the many dangers that surrounded, some favourable point on which to found a hope, were all suddenly recalled to one object, by the approach of Cardinal Mazarin, who, by his hurried step and anxious countenance, appeared to be troubled by some unforeseen event.

Notwithstanding their being linked in one cause, notwithstanding their present interests drawing together, notwithstanding all the apparent friendship that existed between them, Chavigni looked upon the cardinal as one who with less zeal had rivalled him in the favour of Richelieu, and who with less talent had insinuated himself as much into the affairs of government; and Mazarin, although obliged to coalesce with Richelieu's favourite, looked forward to the day when the struggle for pre-eminence between them would come to a climax, and one would rise upon the ruin of the other; and he saw clearly that when that day did arrive, all his own subtlety would hardly qualify him to compete with the bold mind and vigorous talents of Chavigni, unless he could in the first instance gradually acquire for himself such a superiority of interest, as to enable him to command rather than contend for the highest station.

The natural effect of these conflicting interests was a feeling of jealous suspicion in the mind of each, which in Mazarin only appeared by the care he took to strengthen his influence wherever it was most opposite to that of Chavigni; while, at the same time, he showed his fellow statesman an outward respect and deference almost amounting to servility. But on the other part, Chavigni's hasty disposition made his dislike more apparent, though he took no means of injuring his rival.

As they approached each other, the cardinal made a sign to the page who attended him to remain behind, and folding the train of his robe over his arm, he advanced quickly to Chavigni, and embraced him with the greatest semblance of attachment. "My excellent friend," he exclaimed, "I have sought you every where: let me beg you to fly instantly to Tarascon, or all our hopes are ruined."

"In truth," replied Chavigni, not allowing Mazarin to explain the motives of his request, "your eminence requires what I can hardly comply with; as I have but now got business on my hands which needs some time to manage, But may I crave the object which would be gained by my going to Tarascon? I should think that he who could stay two hostile armies on the point of battle, was fully sufficient to any stroke of policy."

There was a sarcastic smile on the lip of Chavigni, as he alluded to the peace which Mazarin had procured at Casal, at the moment when the French and Spanish armies were about to engage; but the cardinal would see only the compliment. "You are too kind," replied he, "but in this instance, you only can succeed; you only I feel assured—and that, not without the exertion of all your influence—can prevent the cardinal prime minister from sending his resignation to the king."

"His resignation!" exclaimed Chavigni, starting back with unfeigned astonishment. "In the name of Heaven, what do you mean?"

"I mean this, Chavigni," replied Mazarin, "that unless you reach Tarascon before daylight to-morrow morning, and use every argument in your power to produce, the courier, who bears the official resignation of his Eminence of Richelieu, will have set out for this place. I saw the paper signed to-day, with my own eyes, before I came away; and all that my utmost entreaties could gain was, that it should be delayed till to-morrow morning, in hopes of your arrival before that time. His eminence feels convinced that the king's favour and his own power are lost for ever; and, in truth, I begin to think so too."

"Madness and folly!" exclaimed Chavigni, striking his hand against his forehead with vexation. "Madness and folly!—Rascal! saddle me a horse," he continued to a groom, who now loitered into the court with that sort of slow indifferent air which would put an angel in a passion. "Where, in the name of all the devils, have you been lingering? Pardon me, your eminence—but I am vexed. I did not think his great mind was so overthrown.—Saddle me a horse, I say! Slave! must you stand eavesdropping? Better you had been born deaf than overhear my conversation. There are such things as oubliettes to cure listeners. Saddle me a horse, I say!"

"Will you not take some of my servants with you?" said Mazarin; "they are all in readiness."

"No, no," replied Chavigni, "I go alone. Do not let it get abroad that I am gone. I will be back betimes to-morrow."

"You had better take one servant, at least," said the cardinal. "The roads are not safe. It is dangerous."

"Dangerous!" exclaimed Chavigni. "Who thinks of danger when his all is at stake? Your eminence has a great regard for human lives, I know—for mine more especially. But depend upon it, I shall come home safe to-morrow, though I go alone to-night. Now, sir," he continued to the groom, who led forth a strong black hunter for his service, "girth up the saddle a little tighter: unbuckle that cross from his poitral; I am neither going on a pilgrimage nor a procession."

And now, walking twice round the horse to see that all the caparisons were in right order, he sprang into the saddle, and dashing his rowels into the hunter's flank, galloped out of the court-yard, bowing with a smile as he passed by Mazarin, who started back a step, as the horse's feet, in the rapidity of its course, struck fire with the stones of the pavement.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

WHILE, as we have seen, Chavigni galloped off towards Tarascon, forgetting in the agitation produced by the tidings of Mazarin, to take those measures which he had proposed in regard to Villa Grande, Cinq Mars returned directly towards the palace, or, rather, the house which had been converted into a palace for the king's use. It was one of those old buildings which at that time were common in France, and which, even now, are often to be met with in cities where the remains of ancient splendour—left alone to the less destructive power of time—have not been demolished by the violence of turbulent times, or the still more inveterate enmity of modern improvement. The whole front, with the two octagonal towers at the sides, and the long corridors on the right and left hand of the court, were ornamented with a multitude of beautiful arabesques and bas-reliefs. These last, the bas-reliefs, entirely covered the principal façade of the building, and offered a number of pictures in stone, representing in some parts battles and triumphs, and in others displaying the humbler and more peaceful subjects of pastoral life and religious ceremonies. Amongst the rest was one medallion which caught the attention of Cinq Mars; and as the failing light prevented him from seeing it where he stood, he approached to observe it. The chisel of the sculptor, usurping the place of the pencil, had there portrayed a landscape with a flock of sheep pasturing quietly by the side of a brook, while a shepherd appeared sleeping under a hill, down which a wolf was seen stealing upon the flock. Underneath was written, in old gothic characters, Eveillez vous, le loup s'approche.

Cinq Mars smiled as he read it, applying the warning to himself. "Let him come," said he, thinking of Richelieu; "he will be caught himself." So saying, he turned, and entering the palace, retired to his own apartments. He had not remained there long, however, before he was once more joined by Fontrailles. "Follow me, quick Cinq Mars," cried the conspirator; "the king asks for you. Now is the moment to speak to him. He thinks that his peevishness hurt you this morning, and he is willing to make atonement."

It may be well supposed that Cinq Mars lost no time in following his companion up the great staircase to the king's apartments. It was, indeed, as Fontrailles had said. Since his return, Louis had enjoyed an hour of repose, which cleared from his mind the irritability induced by fatigue, and made him reproach himself for the unkindness he had shown to one so devotedly attached to him as the master of the horse. The remembrance of it oppressed him, and he sent for his favourite, not indeed to apologise, but to wipe away the impression that his irritability had caused, by more than usual kindness and familiarity. The two conspirators found Louis seated in a cabinet, which, being placed in one of the towers, partook of its octangular form. The walls were wainscoted with dark carved oak, and even the plafond was all of the same gloomy-coloured material, except a massy gilt cornice and projecting rose in the centre, from which hung a single silver lamp, the rays of which, falling on the figure of the king beneath, gave an a rational paleness to his worr but fine countenance, and slightly touching upon his plain black velvet suit, shone full on the richly illuminated book in which he had been reading.

Louis raised his eyes as Fontrailles entered, and then turning them full on the noble countenance of Cinq Mars, who followed, a pleased smile beamed for a moment on his lip, and he exclaimed, "Well, Cinq Mars, art thou Nimrod enough to hunt again to-morrow after our misfortunes of to-day? Come in, Monsieur de Fontrailles," he continued, seeing that Fontrailles remained near the door, hesitating whether he should retire or not, now that he had done the king's bidding in summoning the grand écuyer. "Come in, I pray—sit you down, gentlemen—it is the king's request: you, Cinq Mars, here—Monsieur de Fontrailles, there is a seat. Now," he continued, glancing his eye round as the light of the lamp gleamed faintly on their several countenances—"now we look like some secret triumvirate met to decide the fate of nations."

"And that might be, too," replied Cinq Mars: "your majesty to command, and we to execute."

The king took no notice, but went on with what he had himself been saying: "There is Cinq Mars looks like a noble prince, and Fontrailles like a wily minister, and I—I believe," he continued, laughing, "I have left myself no place but that of secretary."

"Alas!" said Cinq Mars, with a deep sigh, "alas! that there should be any man in your majesty's dominions more a king than yourself."

Fontrailles and the king both started; and the conspirator internally pronounced "All is lost," while Cinq Mars himself, who had spoken without thought, only felt the imprudence of his speech when it was beyond recall.

"Cinq Mars! Cinq Mars!" cried Louis, "that is a daring speech;—but I know it proceeded from your love for me, and therefore I pardon it. But I will tell you that no man is more a king in France than I am."

"I crave your majesty's gracious pardon," replied the master of the horse. "If I have offended your majesty, it was from love for you alone that I spoke. My words were bolder than my thoughts, and I only meant to say that I could wish to see my monarch show himself that great king which he naturally is. I would fain see the staff of command withdrawn from one who abuses it."

"Cinq Mars," answered the king, "that staff is in my own hand. It was but lent, my friend, and it is now resumed."

The master of the horse paused for a moment, not exactly certain how far he could rely upon the king's good humour, which he had already tried so incautiously, and turned his eyes towards Fontrailles, as if for counsel.

"Speak, Cinq Mars," said Louis, seeing his hesitation, "speak boldly, and fear not; for I fully believe that all your wishes are for my service, and I would fain hear the voice of those that regard me with affection, rather than for their own interest; and one of these do I hold you to be."

"Your majesty does me justice," replied Cinq Mars. "Let me not offend you then, when I say that the power you lent is scarcely resumed while the title under which it was enjoyed remains. The Cardinal Duke of Richelieu, my liege, is still prime minister of France. He has still all the power (though not exercised), the revenues, the offices. Our soldiers are fighting at his command, our provinces are governed by his creatures, our high posts are filled by his friends. He has an army for his servants, and more than the riches of a prince. Why not—oh, why not, sire, break the enchanter's wand that gave him so much sway, and sweep away the hordes that prey upon the state, like swarms of flies upon a slain deer? Why not direct the operations of your troops yourself, and let the armies of France be the armies of the king, and not of Richelieu? Why not chase from your councils a man who has so often abused the generous confidence of his sovereign, and make him disgorge the ill-gotten wealth which he has wrung from the hearts of your people?"

As he spoke, Cinq Mars grew warm with his subject; his eye sparkled, his arm was extended with that wild and graceful energy for which he was conspicuous; his words flowed uninterrupted, with all the eloquence of enthusiasm, and his fine and princely features acquired a new and striking expression, while, animated in the cause of his country's liberty, he pleaded against the tyrant who had oppressed both king and people. Louis gazed on him at first as on one inspired; but as a host of consequences crowded on his mind, threatening him with a thousand vague and unsubstantial dangers, he placed his hands before his eyes, and remained for some moments in deep thought.

"My friend," said he at length, "what is it you would have me do? This man—this bad man, if you will, but still this great man—is like an oak whose roots are deep in the earth: you may hew them asunder one by one, but it requires a giant's strength to pluck the tree up at once. Richelieu's power may be taken from him gradually; but to attempt what you propose, would instantly cause a rebellion amongst my subjects. He has so many who depend upon him—he has so many that are allied to him—"

"What!" exclaimed Cinq Mars, "shall it be said that King Louis was afraid to dismiss his own minister?"

"Not afraid for myself, sir," replied the king, somewhat sharply; "but afraid of bringing the miseries of civil war upon my people."

Perceiving that Cinq Mars was urging the king too impetuously, Fontrailles, who had hitherto remained silent, now joined in the conversation in a soft, insinuating tone, calculated to remove any newly-raised irritation from Louis's mind. "All danger, sire," said he, still labouring to quiet the king's fears, without opposing his opinion, "all danger, which might otherwise be imminent, could easily be obviated by commanding the noble Duke of Bouillon—"

At the name of the Duke of Bouillon, Louis made an impatient motion with his hand. "He is Spanish at his heart," said he; "that Duke of Bouillon is Spanish, rank Spanish. But what of him, Monsieur de Fontrailles?"

"Believe me, my liege," replied Fontrailles, "the Duke of Bouillon, whom I know well, is not so much a friend to Spain as he is an enemy to Richelieu. Remember, sire, how he is linked with the Prince of Orange, the sworn adversary of Spain."

Louis shook his head doubtingly. "But what of him, Fontrailles? Come to the point."

"Only this, sire," said Fontrailles: "The duke commands an army in Italy devoted to your majesty's service; but permit me or Cinq Mars to give him private orders in your name, to march them into France, and who shall dare to murmur at your royal will?"

"Why, that might be done, it is true," answered Louis; "but I am afraid, mon grand," he continued, applying to Cinq Mars the term by which he distinguished him in his kindest and most familiar moments—"I am afraid, mon grand, that though thou art a keen huntsman and a good soldier, thou wouldst make but a sorry minister."

"I, minister!" exclaimed the grand écuyer; "God forbid! No, no, my lord! never did such a thought cross my imagination. Believe me, sire, I had no view of personal aggrandizement in the proposal I submitted to your majesty."

"But if you take from Richelieu his office, whom do you wish to substitute in his place?" demanded Louis: "some one must be minister."

"True, my liege; but are there not thousands well fitted for the post?" said Cinq Mars: "politicians as deep, but more humane, than Richelieu—men who can govern, and yet not tyrannize? I will undertake to find such a one for your majesty, and yet remain myself fully satisfied with being the humble friend of my royal master, and the sincere well-wisher of my native country. But let me order, in your name, the Duke of Bouillon to march into France, and then, provided with sufficient forces to disarm this usurping minister, and overawe rebellion, your own royal will will be your own guide."

"At present," said Fontrailles, "the king's love for his people operates in two opposing directions, making him anxious to relieve them from the burden under which they groan, yet fearful of throwing a portion of them in rebellion. But by the presence of the duke's army, the minister might be removed without endangering the tranquility of the realm."

"True," said Louis, "true; Monsieur de Fontrailles, you say right;" and placing his hand before his eyes, the king thought for a moment, struggling inwardly to exert the powers of his mind, and call up sufficient resolution to deliver himself from the thralldom in which he had so long been held. But dangers, and doubts, and difficulties swam before his mental vision, like motes dancing in the sunbeam; and, never destined in life to overcome his long-encouraged inactivity, he strove to cast the responsibility from himself. "Well, well," exclaimed he, "Cinq Mars, you shall decide it; I will leave the conduct of it all to you. But beware that you do not bring the miseries of civil war upon my kingdom; for be assured that if you do, I will require it of you deeply: it is your own seeking, and the consequences be upon your own head."

"Let it be so, then, my liege," cried Cinq Mars, kissing the emaciated hand of the feeble monarch; "it shall not be my fault if France and my sovereign are not soon freed from the cloud that has so long overshadowed them both."

"Well, well," said Louis, "we will trust in God for the event. But beware of Bouillon, Cinq Mars; he is rank Spanish at his heart. And now, gentlemen, to bed; for we must rise in time for our sport. But, in truth, I fear I shall not hunt much longer—the body fails me, Cinq Mars, though I was once a thing of strength, as thou art."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

WHILE these schemes for the downfall of his patron was going forward at Narbonne, Chavigni spurred on rapidly towards Tarascon, where the falling minister lay sick, both in body and in mind. Besides the personal attachment of the statesman to Richelieu, who had formed his fortunes, and led him in the way to greatness, every consideration of his own interest bade him oppose the resignation of the cardinal, which he clearly saw would bring inevitable destruction upon all persons connected with the existing ministry.

He had long perceived that a powerful party was forming against Richelieu, especially since his absence and illness gave facility to their operations. All Chavigni's talents and influence had been exerted to oppose them ; but that the cardinal would resign his high office, he had never suspected for a moment ; and therefore the tidings brought by Mazarin came upon him like a thunder-stroke, taking from him all faculty of thought but on that one thing. He was well aware, too, that it was no easy task to turn Richelieu from his purpose ; and as he rode on, his mind was solely occupied by a thousand tumultuous and ill-digested plans for preventing the execution of what the cardinal designed.

Daylight set in the west, and night fell heavily over the earth, without exciting a thought in the bosom of Chavigni ; for the irritation of his feelings took away all sensation of bodily fatigue, and almost all attention to external objects, till at length the failing pace of his horse showed him that he at least must have rest ; and, accordingly, he paused for a short space at a little village a few leagues from Tarascon, in order to refresh his beast. Yet even here the agitation of his mind prevented him from seeking any repose himself, and he continued walking up and down before the little auberge, for the time that he was thus compelled to remain.

It was considerably past midnight when Chavigni arrived at the residence of the minister. On entering the courtyard, all was in darkness, except where, in one spot, a light was seen burning in the chamber of the invalid, and throwing dark across the window the bent shadow of a sleeping attendant. The statesman fastened his horse to one of the iron hooks in the courtyard, and advanced, intending to make himself heard by some one within ; but he found that the grooms, grown negligent during their lord's sickness, had left the door unfastened, and pushing it with his hand, it readily gave way.* "It is like his fate," thought Chavigni : "while he is ill and sleeping, the gate is left open, and any one may enter."

Passing onward through the hall, he now mounted the grand staircase, lighted by a lamp that had been left to die out as it might, and approached the room where the cardinal lay.

The door of the antechamber opened stiffly, but still the drowsy attendant did not wake; and Chavigni passed on into the bedchamber of the cardinal, without any one being aware of his presence. "Were this but known," thought the statesman, "how many assassins' hands would now be armed for this one man's destruction!"

It was Richelieu alone, who, lying in feverish restlessness, caught the sound of approaching steps; and there was a sort of intensity in the glance which he fixed on the door communicating with the anteroom, which seemed to say that his judgment of the visiter's purpose was not very favourable. However that might be, whether from the recklessness of illness, or from the torpor of one who regards the future as a blank, he took no further notice of the sound he heard, than by fixing his eyes sternly on the door. But the next moment, as the light fell strongly on the face of his friend, the countenance of Richelieu brightened with a smile; and perceiving that Chavigni, who did not see he was awake, approached silently towards the attendant to rouse him, the cardinal pronounced his name in an under tone, and beckoned him towards his bedside.

"It is grateful," said Richelieu, as the statesman drew near, "to find that even declining fortunes cannot alienate some hearts. You have seen Mazarin, I suppose."

Chavigni was about to answer, but the sound of the cardinal's voice had awakened the attendant, who was now gazing about in no small alarm, on perceiving a stranger standing by the minister's bedside. Richelieu, however, without showing any anger at his negligence, calmly commanded him to leave them; and as soon as they were alone, Chavigni proceeded: "I have seen Cardinal Mazarin, my lord, and from him I have learned a piece of news which grieves me most deeply. I cannot believe that illness can have so far depressed the spirits of your eminence, as to make you entertain the thought of casting from you all those high honours, which you have so long enjoyed, and of leaving France, in a moment of her greatest peril, to be governed by the hands of the weak and the designing."

"It is not illness, Chavigni," replied the cardinal, with a melancholy shake of the head. "No ! but my day is over. The power has passed from my hands, and it only remains for me to yield the name of it, before that too is taken from me by my enemies."

"Pardon me, your eminence," said Chavigni ; "but indeed the power is not gone from you. Under whose orders are our armies fighting ? Under whose command is every city and fortress in France ? Is it the character of a great man—is it the character of a brave man, to yield all without a struggle ?—to cast away the sword he has so long wielded, and to give himself bound into the hands of his adversaries ?"

"Mark me, Chavigni," said Richelieu, raising himself upon his elbow : "Louis is now within the distance of a few leagues. He knows that I am ill—perhaps that I am dying ; and yet by no sign of common courtesy does he show that he remembers me. But that was not the beginning. I saw that my power was gone, when he dared, in the face of all the council, to annul the sentence I had passed on that arrogant, stiff-necked Count de Blénau, who had the hardihood to defy the utmost extent of my power." And the minister's eyes flashed with the memory of his anger.

"Had your eminence followed my advice," replied Chavigni, "that business would never have occurred. There is that sort of gallant magnanimity about Claude de Blénau which carries all before it ; and I felt assured that neither fear nor interest would ever induce him to disclose any thing intrusted to his honour. Depend upon it, monseigneur, that it is better not to meddle with such men, when we can avoid it."

"Well, well, sir," exclaimed the cardinal, impatiently, "without doubt you were quite right and I was quite wrong. But do not teach me to believe that you too, Chavigni, lose your respect for my person when my power is failing."

"Pardon me, your eminence," replied Chavigni, in a tone of deep feeling, "you wrong me much. Your eminence has been more than a father to me. During the continuance of your power, you have always exerted it in my favour; and whether it remains with you or not, my respect and my affection will never fail to follow you in every situation. Believe me, monseigneur, that it is that respect and affection which brings me here even now, to petition that you will waive your intention of——”

“Chavigni, it is useless,” interposed the cardinal. “I have only the choice left, to yield it of my own free will, or to have it wrenched from my unwilling hand. Judge which is the wisest—judge which is the best.”

“Were that certainly the case,” said Chavigni, thoughtfully—

“It is certainly the case,” replied the minister. “There are many, many combined against me: singly they are but reeds, and one by one I would break them like reeds; but united together, and with the king for their chief,”—and he shook his head despairingly,—“they are far too strong for either you or me!”

“But could no means be found to separate them? Bethink you, monseigneur,—avarice, revenge, ambition, might sow the seeds of discord amongst them, and give them like sheep into our hands.”

“It is too late, my friend!” replied the cardinal; “it is too late! Had I foreseen it, I might have prevented their combining. I might have crushed some, and bribed others; destroyed the powerful, and overawed the timid. But it is now too late!”

“But whom does your eminence think particularly implicated?” demanded Chavigni.

“Oh, there are many—many—many!” replied Richelieu, withdrawing the thin pale hand he had stretched over his face as he finished the last desponding words “too late,” probably desirous of hiding the emotion produced by the conviction that his power was irrevocably gone. However, when that hand was removed, his countenance showed no traces of any remaining agitation. “There are many, Chavigni,” he said: “there are Vendôme, and Bouillon, and noisy Beaufort, and turbulent Gaston of Orleans, and witty Marsillac, and cool, moralizing De Thou, who has so often dared to pry into my actions and condemn them;—then there is, above all, sly Fontrailles, and Cinq Mars, whom I——”

“Ha!” exclaimed Chavigni, as the cardinal’s words recalled to his mind the conversation between Cinq Mars and Fontrailles—“I had forgot—like an idiot, I had forgot!” and he struck his clenched hand violently against his brow, as if he sought to punish his own folly. “But it is not yet too late,” he cried, “it is not yet too late!”

“Forgot what, Chavigni?” demanded the cardinal, seeing with astonishment the emotion which was called up in his friend by the remembrance of the great oversight he had committed. “Forgot what? Too late for what? What is it moves you so deeply?”

“Pardon me, your eminence,” replied Chavigni, “I have not time to explain; only I have to ask two favours. The first is, that you will let me take a stout horse from your stables; mine will go no further. The next,” he added, in a tone of greater composure, but still one of earnest entreaty—“the next is, if you had ever a regard for me—if ever I served you well and faithfully, that you will promise me to take no step in the business we have spoken of, till my return; which shall be before to-morrow evening.”

“It can make but little difference waiting till that time,” answered the cardinal. “But what is the matter, Chavigni? What is it agitates you thus?”

“Have I your promise, monseigneur?” asked Chavigni quickly.

“You have,” said Richelieu. “Out of regard for you, and solely because you ask it, I will suspend my resolution till your return.”

“Well, then, God protect your eminence till we meet again!” exclaimed the statesman. “I go upon your service; and if I do not succeed, I care not how soon my head may be brought to the block, as a just punishment for my mad forgetfulness.” Thus saying, he quitted the room, and descending to the stables, called up the grooms, whose sleepy movements ill accorded with the rapid emotions of his bosom. Now, the stirrups were not long enough, then the girths had to be buckled tighter, then the bit was mislaid, and then the crupper could not be found. At length, however, the horse was fully prepared, and calling for a cup of wine, Chavigni drained it to the bottom, and galloping out of the court, was soon once more on the road to Narbonne. But it was in vain that he used whip and spur to arrive at that town before the hour appointed for the Italian's departure. Ere he had measured half the way, the day rose bright over the hills before him, and clenching his hands, he exclaimed in the bitterness of disappointment, "Too late! I am too late!" Still, however, he went on at full speed, hoping that by sending out couriers in every different direction, he might yet overtake the messenger.

Every one who has ridden from Tarascon to Narbonne, must remember the picturesque beauties of that part of the country. At the spot where Chavigni had now arrived, high rocks, breaking forth from a thick covering of wood, skirted his way on each side, and having ascended to the top of the hill, an immense valley lay before him, scattered with forests, and broken into a thousand inferior ridges, some of which bore upon their summits the steeple of a village church, some the ruins of those ancient towers which had been erected in days gone by, to defend the passes from the neighbouring Moors of Spain. At his feet thin waves of white mist, floating in the morning light, partially obscured the road he was going, till, rising out of the trees, it was seen winding along the mountains on the other side. Chavigni paused for a moment to trace its direction, and as he did so, his eye fell upon the figure of a single horseman, descending into the valley from the opposite hill.

"Whom have we here?" thought the statesman, not without a faint hope that it might be the person he sought. Spurring on his horse, however, he rode forward to meet him; but on approaching the bottom of the descent, the figure he had seen from above became hidden by the windings of the road amongst the trees, and Chavigni's heart fluttered lest the horseman, whoever he was, might have taken the other road, which turned through the valley to the left.

At length the sound of a horse's feet was heard approaching quickly towards him, and, certain that he must now pass that way, the statesman drew in his rein, and stood with his eyes intently fixed upon the spot where the road verged into the forest. As there was still a considerable descent from the spot where Chavigni paused to the bottom of the valley, the sound was heard for a long time coming nearer and nearer before any one appeared. At last the horseman came in sight, presenting to the glad eyes of the statesman the identical figure of the Italian, Villa Grande, with his long sword, extensive mustaches, and a pair of heavy pistols at his saddle-bow.

Chavigni doubted not, that to possess himself of the papers which the Italian carried, would require a desperate struggle, but without a moment's hesitation he drew his sword, and galloped on to attack him. No sooner had Villa Grande perceived a stranger on the road before him, than he reined in his horse; but now, as Chavigni rode on full speed towards him, with a menacing attitude and drawn sword, the Italian, in his terror, conceived at once that it was a robber, and throwing himself to the ground in mortal fear, he fell on his knees, exclaiming, "I will give it you all—every ducat, only spare my life!"

"Rise, rise! cowardly villain!" cried Chavigni, catching the bridle of the Italian's horse, which was starting away with a wild toss of the head, as the statesman rode up—"Rise, Sir Poltroon! do you know me?"

"Know you! know you!" exclaimed Villa Grande, gazing wildly at Chavigni. "Oh! monseigneur, is it you? How you frightened me!" But Villa Grande, who had trembled sufficiently when he thought it was a robber, trembled ten times more than ever as he recognised the statesman; and he could scarcely find strength in his knees to raise himself from the ground.

"Rise, sir!" exclaimed Chavigni impatiently, "and instantly give me the treaty."

"Treaty!" cried Villa Grande, still trembling, but endeavouring to assume a look of astonishment, which was contradicted by the fearful consciousness of his own heart. "What treaty does monseigneur mean? I know of no treaty."

"Lying slave!" exclaimed Chavigni, striking him with the flat side of his sword: "if you do not produce it within ten seconds of time, by heaven I will cut it out of your base, cowardly heart!"

"But if I do ——" said the Italian, seeing there was no escape left.

"Come, sir," cried the statesman, "no buts for me. If you stand shuffling one minute more, I will run my sword through you, and search for it on your carcass myself."

"Well, well, monseigneur, I see you know it all, and therefore it will be no stain on my honour if I give it to you."

"Honour!" cried Chavigni, with a scoff. "Come, sir, the treaty!"

Villa Grande approached his horse, and raising the flap of the saddle, with shaking hands drew forth, from a pocket concealed in the padding, a large paper in a sealed envelope. Chavigni caught it eagerly from his grasp, and running his eye over the address, he read—"To Monseigneur the Duke de Bouillon, commander-in-chief of all the armies of France warring in Italy."—"Ha!" continued the statesman, "this is not the road to Italy. What brings you here?" and he turned towards Villa Grande. But while the statesman's eyes were fixed upon the paper, the wily Italian had begun to creep towards the wood. Chavigni, however, perceiving his design, caught one of the pistols from the horse's saddle-bow, and pointing it towards the fugitive, soon brought him back again. "Stand you there, sir!" said he. "Now tell me what makes you here, when this packet was intended for Italy?"

"Why, monseigneur—why—why—to tell the truth, there was another little despatch to be delivered on the frontiers of Spain; here it is;" and diving into a deep pocket in his doublet, he produced a packet smaller than the other, and gave it into Chavigni's hand. "And now, monseigneur, I have freely discovered all I know," continued Villa Grande, "I hope that you, monseigneur, will promise me your protection; for if the other party get hold of me, they will murder me to a certainty."

Chavigni made no answer, but, without any ceremony, broke the seals of the two packets, and passing his horse's bridle over his arm while he read them, he opened the treaty, and turned to the list of names by which it was signed. In the mean while, Villa Grande kept his eyes fixed upon him, watching for a favourable moment to escape, if the statesman's attention should be sufficiently engaged to allow him so to do.

"Ah! here I have them fairly written," proceeded Chavigni, speaking to himself. "Philip, the most catholic!—Olivarez!—then follow Gaston of Orleans; Cinq Mars, grand écuyer—Fontrailles—and a space—for Bouillon, of course! Now, let us see the letter to the noble duke;" and he opened the one which he found in the same packet with the treaty. But as he read, his eye fixed with painful earnestness upon the paper, and the colour fled from his cheek. "God of heaven! what is this?" said he, reading—"Though I doubt not, my noble friend, that after all which has lately passed, you would put your forces in motion at my simple desire, the king's command is yet higher authority; and that I now send you, to march with all speed to the frontier, embarking five thousand foot at Porto Longone, to land at Marseilles. All this in case the friends and adherents of Richelieu should attempt to make head against the royal authority.'"

"All is lost!" muttered Chavigni. "But let us see the whole, at least, to provide for our own safety;" and he again turned to the paper, which proceeded—"I send you the treaty with Spain for your signature, which is especially necessary to the article relative to your principality of Sedan. The troops of his catholic majesty are on the frontier, ready to march at our command; but I have been obliged to conceal from the king our Spanish connexion, as his hatred to that country is as great as ever.'"

"I have you! I have you! Monsieur Cinq Mars," exclaimed Chavigni, clasping his hands with joy. "This treaty is your death-warrant, or I know not king Louis. Italian scoundrel!" he continued, turning to look for Villa Grande. —"Ha! the slave has escaped!—that must not be; he were the best witness in the world against them ;" and springing from his horse, he tied him to a tree, together with that of the Italian.

While Chavigni had been reading, with all his attention fixed upon the paper, and all his passions excited by its contents, Villa Grande, watching his moment, had crept gradually to the edge of the wood, and darted into a narrow path, half covered with branches. But though the way he had taken was thus, in a degree, concealed, it did not escape the quick eye of the statesman ; and as the motions of the Italian, till he had got into the wood, had been necessarily cautious, in order not to call his attention, Chavigni, following as fast as lightning, soon caught the sound of his retreating footsteps, reverberated from the rocks around. As he advanced, he called loudly to the Italian to stop, and that he should have a free pardon ; but Villa Grande, trusting to the distance that was still between them, and hoping, if he could elude immediate pursuit, to be able to escape into Spain, continued running on, while Chavigni as perseveringly followed, threatening and promising by turns, but alike without effect.

At length the strength of the Italian, already diminished by fear, began to fail entirely ; and Chavigni found that the distance between them was rapidly lessening, when in a moment the sound of footsteps, which had hitherto guided him, ceased entirely ; a cry of agony reached his ear ; and running still more quickly forward, he, too, had nearly been precipitated over the edge of a steep crag, which, in the hurry of his flight, the unhappy Italian had not noticed. The statesman's first impulse was to start back, for he was on the very brink of the precipice before he was aware ; but soon recovering himself, he approached the edge, and looking over, he beheld the mangled form of Villa Grande lying on some rough stony ground at the bottom of the rock.

"God of Heaven !" cried Chavigni, " what a fall ! The poor wretch must surely be dead. However, he must not lie there, for the wolves will soon be at him ;" and looking around, he sought for some way to descend the rock. It was a considerable time before he could comply his object, but at length he succeeded, and on arriving at the spot where Villa Grande lay, he found that the Italian, in his flight, had taken a diagonal path through the forest, which cut off a large bend in the main road, and joined it again by a zig-zag path down the rock at some distance. Thus the spot where Villa Grande was then lying, was about half a mile from the place at which he had first been encountered by Chavigni, if the high road was followed; but by the path through the wood the distance could not be more than a few hundred yards. Chavigni's first care was to examine the body of the Italian, who was so entirely deprived of sense, that at first the statesman believed him to be dead; but in a moment or two some signs appeared which led him to conclude that life was not completely extinct; and taking him in his arms, he carried him to the spot where the horses stood. Here he placed him on the stout black hunter which Cinq Mars had lent, and led him slowly to a small town about a mile further on the road.

It has been already stated, that hardly was there a village so petty in the whole extent of France, as not to be furnished with one or more of those agents of Richelieu's minute policy, whose principal duty consisted in communicating every thing that passed around them to another class of superior agents, and also to facilitate all the secret operations of government in the sphere ascribed to them. The actual pay received by these men was but small; but the favour shown to them on all occasions, and the facilities afforded to them in their more ordinary employments, put them above competition with others in the same class, and amply rewarded their private services: for it must always be remembered that their connexion with the government was held as a profound secret, and consequently they always were seen to exercise some open trade, which, in most cases, prevented their less ostensible employment from being even suspected by their neighbours.

It was to the house of one of these inferior agents that Chavigni led the horse charged with the senseless body of Villa Grande; and having commanded that he should be taken in and placed in bed, he himself aided in endeavouring to recall him to life, partly from the natural humanity of his disposition, partly from those political considerations which were ever paramount in his mind. Villa Grande, if he could be restored, would prove, Chavigni knew, too excellent a witness against the conspirators whom he had served, to permit of his life being lightly cast away; especially as it was evident, that either fear or bribery would induce him to confess any thing; but even had it not been for this reflection, the statesman's natural disposition would probably have led him to succour the unhappy man, in whose misfortunes he had been so greatly instrumental.

After many efforts, Villa Grande once more began to evince that the vital spark was not yet extinguished; and having so far succeeded, Chavigni, upon whose mind a thousand subjects of deep import were pressing every moment for attention, gave directions to the agent we have already mentioned, to show every attention to the wounded man, and to keep him, for that day, at his own house, which was situated a quarter of a league out of Limoux; but as soon as night came, to have him privately removed to Corneille, at which place a surgeon could be more easily procured from Carcassonne; and having reiterated the most strict injunctions to keep the whole business profoundly secret, lest the conspirators should learn the fate of their envoy, and take their measures accordingly, Chavigni once more turned his steps towards Tarascon, to recount to Richelieu the events of the day.

CHAPTER XXXV.

It was the small chapel of St. Catherine, otherwise called the Queen's Chapel, attached to the palace church of St. Germain en Laye, to which Potier, Bishop of Beauvais, proceeded with slow steps from the door of private communication with the château, on a night in October, one thousand six hundred and forty-two. He was preceded by two young abbés, carrying lighted tapers, and followed by a group, whose white garments spoke that they came on some occasion of joy. The first of these was Anne of Austria, with her eyes animated, and her countenance glowing with the interest she took in every thing which bore the least appearance of secrecy or romance. Her right arm was passed through that of the Marchioness de Beaumont, who moved on with a calm, rather grave countenance; while on the queen's left, walked a young lady, in the first gay spring of life, ever and anon turning a smiling, playful glance behind to Pauline de Beaumont, who, leaning on the arm of Claude de Blénau, followed, agitated, blushing, and happy, towards the altar at which they were to be united for ever. Seguin, the queen's physician, and Henri de La Mothe, the count's page, were admitted as witnesses to the ceremony; and an attendant was stationed at the door, to guard against any troublesome devotee entering the church during the time it was thus occupied.

The idea of marrying Pauline de Beaumont privately to the Count de Blénau, had entirely originated with the queen, whose passion for any thing romantic often threw both herself and her friends into situations of great danger. In the present instance, she represented to Madame de Beaumont that a thousand circumstances might occur in those unhappy times, to tear De Blénau again from her he loved; or that the cardinal might positively prohibit their marriage, and then, she asked, who would dare to oppose him? whereas their private union would obviate all difficulties, and incur no danger.

Madame de Beaumont made many objections, and her daughter hesitated; but the wishes of the queen overcame all the marchioness's scruples; and the entreaties of De Blénau were not less powerful with Pauline.

The appointed night being arrived, and all the arrangements having been made as privately as possible, Pauline, as we have said, followed her mother and the queen into the Chapel of St. Catherine. But as she did so, there was a sort of despondency fell upon her that she could not account for. As she leaned upon De Blè nau, she felt that she was most happy in being united to him. She was agitated, it was true, but still it was natural that she should be so, she thought. All her duties, all her ideas, were, by one single word, about to suffer an entire change, yet that did not take from her happiness. But still there was an undefined fear, a sort of melancholy presentiment which weighed upon her spirits she knew not why. She asked herself, was De Blè nau less kind? Oh, no! And as the thought passed through her mind, she raised her eyes for a moment from the ground, on which they had been bent, and turned them on her lover. In so doing, they met the full, soft, affectionate gaze, with which De Blè nau was at that moment regarding her, and a deep blush rose in her cheek, but soon faded away, and left her again pale and thoughtful. She had not, however, much time to analyse her feelings; for, by this time, the bishop had reached the altar, and waited their approach.

Potier, Bishop of Beauvais, had little of that gentleness of disposition, or suavity of manner, calculated to re-assure Pauline. He had undertaken the office which he came there to fulfil merely at the desire of the queen, and that not without making considerable opposition. But, though Potier was obstinate, Anne of Austria was still more so. She had resolved that the ceremony should be performed, and that he should perform it, and she carried her point; but yet he made his dislike to the task very apparent, and regarded the innocent Pauline with no very friendly looks.

"Come, mademoiselle," said he, as Pauline seemed to linger for a moment, "you and Monsieur le Comte will have enough of each other's society after my office is over. Let us proceed with the ceremony."

The group arranged themselves round the altar, and the bishop opening the book began to read. The promise, which was to bind her to De Blè nau for ever, trembled on Pauline's lips, when a confused noise at the private door leading to the palace caught her ear, and she paused.

De Blè nau, who had not heard it, turned towards her in surprise; but immediately the voice of the attendant, who had been stationed there as portgreve, was heard exclaiming to some one, who apparently endeavoured to make his way into the church, "Stand back, I say! You do not enter here! What is your authority?"

"My authority," replied another voice, "is a warrant of council. Oppose it if you dare. Strike him down, if he does not let you pass!" And immediately the door bursting open, an officer of the cardinal's guard, with a file of soldiers, entered the church.

"Guard the doors!" cried the officer, "and let no one quit the place." And giving his partizan to one of the soldiers, he advanced towards the high Gothic arch, forming the boundary between the main aisle and the Chapel of St. Catherine.

Pauline clung to De Blè nau. "Oh, Claude!" cried she, "they are going to tear you from me again. My heart misgave me—I was sure that something dreadful would interpose between us."

De Blè nau whispered a few words of comfort to her, and Potier himself was moved by her agitation. "Do not be afraid, young lady," said he; "we are on sacred ground. Stop, sir," he continued, advancing to the steps of the chapel, which the officer had just reached; "what seek you here? And how do you presume to bring armed men into this church?"

"I come, sir," answered the officer, "with a warrant from his majesty's council, to arrest Claude Count de Blè nau;" and he made a step towards the chapel.

"Hold!" exclaimed the bishop: "you arrest him not here. This ground is sanctuary; and I command you, in the name of God and our holy religion, to withdraw your men, and instantly to quit this church." And he waived his hand with an air of dignified authority.

The officer paused. "But, monseigneur," he replied, "the count is charged with high treason."

"With high treason!" exclaimed the queen.

"With high treason!" echoed Pauline, clinging still closer to De Blè nau's arm, which she held encircled by both her own.

"He is charged with high treason," repeated the officer; "and I must fulfil my duty."

"Were he charged with all the crimes which disgrace humanity," replied the bishop, "here he is sanctuarized; and I command you, on pain of excommunication—you, Sir Officer, and your soldiers, to quit the church. I stand not here to see this altar violated, whatever be your authority."

The officer paused a moment, uncertain how to act. "Well, holy father," replied he at length, "I obey; but I shall take especial care to guard every door of the church; so that if there be any blame, it does not fall on me." And muttering between his teeth the discontent he did not dare to vent aloud, he slowly withdrew his men.

The eye of Anne of Austria watched them intently till the last soldier had passed through the door which communicated with the palace. Then turning quickly to the count, she exclaimed, "Fly quick, De Blénau, up that staircase, cross the jube, through the monk's gallery round the choir. You will find a door on the right that leads into the king's cabinet. Wait there till I send—Quick, fly—I desire—I command you!"

"Oh, fly, Claude, fly!" reiterated Pauline; "they will murder you surely this time, if you do not fly!"

"Pardou me, your majesty—pardon me, dear Pauline," replied De Blénau; "it cannot be. There is no man in France more innocent, in deed, word, or even thought, of treason against his king and country than I am; and Claude de Blénau flies from no one, so long as his honour and integrity remain by him: when these fail, then he may become a coward. But to these will I now trust, and instantly surrender myself to his majesty's warrant. I did not interfere while monseigneur defended the rights of the sanctuary, for he did but the duties of his high office; nor indeed was I willing to yield my sword to a servant of Cardinal Richelieu. Take it, Henry," he continued, unbuckling it from his side, and giving it to the page; "take it; and keep it for your master."

"De Blénau, you are an obstinate man," said the queen. "I will urge nothing; but look at this pale cheek, and fancy what the feelings of that sweet girl must be." And she pointed to Pauline, who stood by with the tears chasing each other down her face.

Notwithstanding the firmness with which he spoke, there had been many a bitter pang struggling in De Blénau's breast. The appeal of the queen, and the sight of Pauline's distress, overcame his calmness; and starting forward, he caught her in his arms and pressed an ardent kiss upon her lips. "Dear, dear Pauline!" he exclaimed, "all will go well, be assured. My innocence will protect me."

Pauline shook her head mournfully, but her heart was too full to reply.

"Then you will not fly?" demanded the queen, with some degree of impatience.

"He is in the right, madam," said the bishop. "As a good subject, he is bound to obey the laws of his country; and in duty to himself, he ought not to give weight to the charge against him by seeming afraid to meet it."

Anne of Austria turned away with a look of angry disappointment. "Well, at all events," said she, "let us conclude the ceremony which has been thus interrupted, and afterwards the count can act as he pleases."

De Blénau hesitated. He felt that what the queen proposed, if carried into effect, would be the only consolation he could receive under the new misfortune that had befallen him; but he felt also that it was a selfishness to wish it, and he looked towards the bishop, who had so well supported his first resolution. But Potier bent his eyes gravely on the ground, disapproving the proposal, yet unwilling further to oppose the queen.

"It shall be as Pauline decides," said De Blénau, taking her hand and raising it gently to his lips. "Pauline," he continued, "you know how deeply I love you; you know how I have longed for the hour that should give me your hand. But I fear that I should be cruelly selfish, were I to ask you to become the bride of one whose fate is so uncertain. Speak, dear Pauline."

Mademoiselle de Béaumont spoke not, but she raised her eyes to De Blénau with an expression which told that every feeling of her heart was given to him. The marchioness, however, interposed. "No!" said she: "Claude, you are right; it is better to wait. The time will come, I feel sure, when you will be able to claim Pauline in the midst of smiles and happiness, instead of tears and danger. Does not your majesty think this delay advisable?"

"My opinion has been expressed already," replied Anne of Austria, peevishly. "But it is not my affair—act as you think fit. But were I Pauline, and my lover gave me up so calmly, I would seek another in his absence to console me."

De Blénau, deeply hurt, bit his lip, and by a strong effort forced himself to silence; but Pauline placed her hand in his, and raising her eyes to his face, "Fear not, Claude," she said; "in life and in death, I am yours. None other shall ever possess the hand of Pauline de Beaumont."

"You are a noble girl, Pauline!" exclaimed the queen. "De Blénau, I was wrong; but it vexes me to see that you will always be more in the right than I am. Do not look so sad, Pauline. On thinking more of this arrest, I begin to change my opinion, and indeed I feel sure that De Blénau's innocence will stand him in good stead yet, in spite of the meager cardinal; and I reckon also somewhat on my own influence with Louis—he is far kinder than in former days; and I will make it a point of earnest prayer, that De Blénau be fairly used. Besides, they have now no plea against him. There are no secret letters to be discovered—no correspondence with the public enemy."

Pauline shook her head mournfully. A cloud had come over the sun of her days, and she fancied that he would never beam brightly again.

"If we could ascertain the reason of this arrest," said Madame de Beaumont, "it might in some degree satisfy our minds."

"That may be easily done," replied the bishop, "as Monsieur de Blénau is resolved to surrender himself. We can question the officer, in regard to what occurred at the place from whence he comes; and by that means discover what circumstances have arisen to cast suspicion on the count."

What the bishop proposed was instantly agreed to; and De Blè nau sent forward his page to inform the officer of his determination.

Anne of Austria then took a few steps along the nave, and turned to see if he still held his resolution. De Blè nau bowed. "I follow your majesty," he said; "I feel that I have nothing to fear." And they passed on slowly and sadly to the other end of the church.

As they went, Pauline still clung to the arm of her lover, as if she feared that every moment they would tear him from her; and tear after tear rolled silently down her cheeks. The heart of De Blè nau also was too full for words, so that silence hung upon the whole party.

At the door which communicated with the palace, stood the cardinal's officer, with two or three of his men; and as she approached, the queen desired him to follow her to the saloon. The officer bowed low, and replied, that he would obey her commands; but immediately advancing to De Blè nau he laid his hand upon the count's arm. "In the king's name, Monsieur le Comte de Blè nau," said he, "I arrest you for high treason. Behold my warrant."

Pauline recoiled with a look of fear; and De Blè nau calmly put the man's hand from off his sleeve. "Pass on, sir," he said, "I am your prisoner." The officer hesitated. "Pass on, sir," repeated the count, somewhat sternly; "you have my word. I am your prisoner."

The man passed on, but not before he had made a sign to the soldiers who were with him, who suffered the count and Pauline to pass, and then closing in, followed at a few paces distance.

On reaching the saloon, the queen took her seat; and beckoning to Pauline, who, faint and terrified, was hardly able to support herself, she made her sit down on the footstool at her feet. "Now, Sir Officer," said Anne of Austria, "what news bring you from Narbonne? How fares his majesty the king?"

"May it please you, madame," he replied, "I come not from Narbonne, as your majesty supposes, but from Tarascon, where the king had just arrived when I departed."

"The king at Tarascon!" exclaimed Anne of Austria. "In the name of Heaven, what does he at Tarascon?"

"That is beyond my knowledge," answered the officer. "All I can tell your majesty is, that for the last week there has been strange flying of couriers from one place to another. Monsieur de Chavigni has almost killed himself with riding between Tarascon and Narbonne. Every thing is altered, evidently, but no one knows how or why; and just as Aleron, Monsieur de Brezé's maître d'hôtel, was about to give me the whole history, I received an order to set off for Paris instantly, and when I arrived there, to take twenty troopers from the caserne, and come on hither on the errand which I have the honour to perform."

"But did you hear nothing?" demanded the queen, earnestly. "Did this Aleron tell you nothing?"

"Nothing, madame," replied the officer. "He had just made me promise inviolable secrecy, and we were interrupted before he began his tale; or I would have told your majesty with pleasure."

"But from report?" said the queen. "Did you gain no knowledge from rumour?"

"Oh, there were rumours enough, truly," answered the man, "but as fast as one came, it was contradicted by another. Some said that the troops at Perpignan had revolted, and some that Monsieur le Grand had killed Cardinal Mazarin. Others brought word that Monsieur de Noyers had tried to poison the king; and others, that the king had kicked Fontrailles for hunting in short boots."

"Nonsense!" said the queen sharply; "all nonsense! It is unfortunate," she continued, musing, "that we can get no information. But tell me, where are you ordered to conduct Monsieur de Blénau?—To the Bastille?"

At the name of a place where both De Blénau and herself had suffered so much, and which was associated in her mind with every horrible idea, Pauline clasped her hands over her eyes, as if to shut out the frightful visions it recalled.

"No, madame," replied the officer; "I am commanded to conduct Monsieur de Blénau, as quickly as possible, to Tarascon; and allow me to remind your majesty that the time is passing fast."

De Blénau made a sign to the officer, indicating that he was ready. He saw that Pauline's hands still covered her eyes, and, wishing to spare her the pain of such a parting, he bowed profoundly to the queen, and moved in silence to the door. The queen and Madame de Beaumont saw his intention, and remained silent; but as he reached the door he could not resist the desire to turn and look once more upon her, whom he was leaving perhaps for ever—who had so nearly been his bride—whom he had loved so long—who had undergone so much for him. It was excusable, but the delay defeated his purpose. The sudden silence alarmed Pauline—she raised her eyes—she saw De Blénau in the act of departing, and the last fixed painful glance with which he regarded her. All but her love was that moment forgotten; and starting wildly forward, she threw herself into his arms, and wept bitterly on his bosom. But Madame de Beaumont advancing, gently disengaged her from his embrace: Pauline hid her eyes upon her mother's shoulder; and De Blénau, with a heart ready to break, fled quickly from a scene that his fortitude could support no longer.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

WE must once more go back to Narbonne, in order to explain the events which had there taken place since the day on which Chavigni possessed himself of the treaty with Spain. Cinq Mars, hearing nothing of his agent, of course concluded that he was quietly pursuing his way; and willing to take every precaution to insure the success of his plans, he spent the next day in riding over to the camp at Perpignan, and endeavouring to ingratiate himself with the officers and soldiers of that part of the army. The splendour of his train and equipages, the manly beauty of his person, his dexterity in all warlike exercises, and the courteous familiarity of his manners, attracted all eyes, and won all hearts; and Cinq Mars, well contented with the day's success, did not return to Narbonne till very late at night.

The next morning had been appointed for hunting; but that day the king was rather later than usual, and Cinq Mars, as he waited in the saloon till Louis should be ready, took up a romance which some of the pages had left behind, and stretching his tall and elegant form at length in the window-seat, he began reading, to pass the time.

The book was The true History of Don Cleofas of Castile; and as Cinq Mars read on, he became interested in the fate of the hero. He had opened the volume at that part where the knight rescues Matilda from the power of the Moors. He was in the act of persuading her to descend the staircase in the tower, at the foot of which the repentant renegade waited with their horses; and Cinq Mars, whose whole heart was full of romance, at one moment entered entirely into the vehement and almost angry arguments of Don Cleofas, and then again felt for the alarm and doubt of the timid Matilda.

So much, indeed, was he occupied, that as some one passed to and from the king's chamber, he scarcely raised his eyes to notice who it was; and when at last he did so, he found it was only a page.

The tale went on, and his eye ran from sentence to sentence, to see if the fears of Matilda had proved fatal to their hopes of escape; and his heart beat with anxiety and alarm as the wind blew the door to behind them, and they listened to hear whether the Moors had been awakened by the sound. It was at that moment that another step met his ear, whose firm, decided pace plainly told that it was not that of a domestic. Cinq Mars raised his eyes, and as he did so, they encountered those of Chavigni, who was passing on to the apartments of the king

Chavigni bowed, with a peculiar smile; Cinq Mars returned the salutation, and again began reading his book. "It is all over with your power, Monsieur de Chavigni," thought the master of the horse: "I will but read out this adventure of the two lovers, and then I will come to disturb your tete-à-tete with his majesty."

Cinq Mars read on. "Don Cleofas and his fair Matilda descended the staircase in the city walls; but before they reached the gate, the alarm was given, and by the time they had mounted their horses, all the garrison was armed for their pursuit. Flights of arrows followed them from the ramparts as they fled, and a body of horse kept close upon their track. But still Don Cleofas pursued his path, the bridle of Matilda's horse thrown over his arm, and his right hand ready to grasp his sword, should the Moors overtake them. It was up the ascent of a steep hill that he took his way, and at the top he reined in his horse, on the edge of the crags which looked down into a peaceful valley below. Don Cleofas sprang to the ground, gave one look to the Moors who were following fast behind, and, as a last resource, catching Matilda in his arms, he leaped from the brink, bounding from rock to rock in the descent, with the agility of an izzard, till at length he reached the deepest part of the valley below." All this was told at full length in the romance. The terrors of Matilda, the daring of the knight, the angry gestures of the Moors, the steepness of the descent, and the calm beauty of the valley, were all dilated upon and described with the utmost minuteness and accuracy; which very much delighted Cinq Mars, but took him a long time to read; so that just at the moment he had got them safely to near the end of their journey, the door of the king's apartments again opened, and Chavigni passed through the room on his return. Perceiving this to be the case, Cinq Mars thought that he might as well go on with his book; which he had just begun to do, when Fontrailles entered the saloon and interrupted him.

"In the name of Heaven, Cinq Mars," exclaimed he, "what are you about?"

"I am waiting till the king is ready," answered the master of the horse composedly, scarce'y taking his eyes from the romance.

"And is it possible," asked Fontrailles in a tone of angry astonishment, "that you have lain here reading that drivelling book, and suffered Chavigni to be again so long with the king?"

"Again!" said Cinq Mars, becoming more attentive; "he only passed once that I saw."

"And ought he to have been there once, if that were all?" asked Fontrailles. "But let me tell you, Cinq Mars, he was there last night for more than an hour. Oh, Cinq Mars! Cinq Mars! is this a time, when our lives, our fortunes, and our country's weal are at stake, to sit there dozing over a romance, and see our bitterest enemy have access to the king's ear, but too easy to be abused? Depend on it, something more will come of this."

"But why did you not let me know," demanded the master of the horse, "that he had seen the king last night?"

"I learned it but this moment," replied Fontrailles. "But here comes a page from the king's apartments. A message to you, Cinq Mars, on my life."

The page approached. "I am commanded by the king's majesty to acquaint you, monsieur," said he, addressing the grand écuyer, "that he feels himself too unwell to enjoy the pleasures of the chase to-day. But he desires that his indisposition may not prevent you, and the other gentlemen invited, from following your sport."—And having delivered this message, the attendant withdrew without waiting for any reply.

"Well, now you see, Fontrailles," exclaimed Cinq Mars, "there is nothing wrong here. Nothing can be more kind or considerate than, when ill himself, to wish us to follow the sport without him."

An expression of heavy, deep-seated thought sat upon brow of the clear-sighted, suspicious Fontrailles. He took two or three steps up and down the apartment, and then, turning to Cinq Mars with a countenance in which painful anxiety and bitter irony were strangely mingled, he considered his companion with an attentive glance, which ran rapidly over his tall elegant figure. "Cinq Mars," said he, "you are more than six feet high, and could spare a few inches of your height upon an occasion—even were they to make you shorter by the head, you would still be a tall man. As for me, I am short already, and cannot afford to be cut down. A word to the wise—I go to shelter myself from pruning-knives. Do as you please. We shall meet in this world or the next. Adieu!" And turning on his heel, he quitted the saloon.

"The man is mad!" said Cinq Mars aloud, as Fontailles left him—"irretrievably cracked!" And jumping up from the window-seat, he descended to the courtyard, called the huntsmen together, mounted his horse, and led the chase as merrily as if nothing had happened but the ordinary trifles of a day.

Had he known all, very different would have been his feelings. The visit of Chavigni to the king was one on which the fate of France depended; and the wily statesman had entered the apartments of the monarch, prepared equally to guard every word he uttered himself, and to watch every turn of Louis's irritable and unsteady mind.

The king was leaning on a table in his cabinet, dressed for the hunting-expedition we have mentioned, and more than an usual degree of peevishness was expressed in his countenance. "Well, sir," exclaimed Louis as Chavigni entered, "what other bad news have you the pleasure of bringing me? What other friends have turned traitors? What other power is about to invade my dominions? By the holy Trinity! I never see your face but it makes me melancholy."

Chavigni was not sorry to perceive the king's irritability. The night before he had conveyed to him, in general terms, the news of a private treaty existing between Spain and some that Louis supposed his friends, and had promised to bring him that morning the names of the different parties engaged. He now came to fulfil that promise, and he saw that the former information had been working upon Louis's mind, and raised in it a degree of impatience and anger that would fall heavily on the first object presented to his resentment. Nor did Chavigni doubt that he would easily be able to turn it in the direction that he wished.

"My liege," replied he, "when I find your majesty's confidence betrayed, your dominions threatened, and even your person in danger, it is my duty to give your majesty timely warning, although the news be as unpleasant for me to bear as for you to hear. To conceal treason is the part of a traitor, and as one of your majesty's council——"

"Well, well, sir," cried Louis, interrupting him, "spare your exculpation. The executioner is doubtless guiltless of the blood he sheds, but it is not a right honourable trade."

An angry flush came over Chavigni's countenance, but it quickly subsided; and he replied calmly, "I came here, as your majesty knows, to give you more minute particulars of the information I rendered you yesterday; and to prove to you that some whom you esteem your dearest friends, and some who are your nearest relations, are the veriest traitors in France. The affair for no one can be more unpleasant than for myself, for there are some to whom I wish well that have in this merited their death: therefore, sire, if you find it too painful to hear, in the name of Heaven, let it rest in silence. I will hie me home and burn the papers I have brought here; and, satisfied with having done my duty, only hold myself ready, when the misfortunes which must follow do arrive, to serve your majesty with my hand and heart." And bowing profoundly, Chavigni took a step back, as if about to quit the presence.

"Hold, Monsieur de Chavigni," said the king, "you have done your duty, we do not doubt. But unpleasant tidings, sir, are not to be received pleasantly. Were it ourself alone that they aimed at, perhaps we might leave treason to overreach itself; but as the welfare of our kingdom is at stake, we must look the frowning truth in the face, and prepare to punish the guilty, be they who they may, that we may ensure the safety of the innocent."

"Louis the Just," said Chavigni, advancing and using a term which had been bestowed upon the king by the astrologers of the day, from his having been born under the sign of 'Libra,' "Louis the Just will not act otherwise than justly; and if I prove not to your majesty's satisfaction that a most dangerous conspiracy is on foot, let your royal indignation fall upon me."

"I know not what you call a conspiracy, sir," answered Louis, his mind reverting to the plans of Cinq Mars, to which, as we have seen, he had given his own sanction only a few nights before, and for the discovery of which he felt as much alarm as if Richelieu possessed the power of punishing him also.

"The conspiracy I speak of, sire," rejoined the statesman, "is formed not only to oblige your majesty to change your ministers, but—"

"I can conceive no plan for obliging me to change my ministers," interrupted the king. "You must have mistaken, Monsieur de Chavigni: perhaps the persons whom you style conspirators, have only in view to make me dutiful petition and remonstrance, in which case I should give their arguments all due weight and consideration. Therefore, if this be the information you bring, I wish to hear no more."

Long accustomed to observe every particular point of weakness in the king's mind, Chavigni at once conceived the whole train of Louis's thoughts, and judged from the very alarm which he saw in the monarch's countenance, that if the cardinal's power could once be re-established, it would be more unbounded than ever; and as these ideas passed through his mind, they called a transient smile upon his lip.

"Why do you smile, sir?" demanded the king, sharply.

"Pardon me, sire," answered Chavigni, "but it was, that you should think me so weak as to trouble you upon such a subject. If leaguings with the enemies you have fought and conquered, be humble petition; if bringing foreign troops to invade your dominions, be dutiful remonstrance; if promising to deliver the strong places of France into the hands of Spain, be loyalty and faith,—then have I unnecessarily disturbed your repose."

Chavigni's speech worked upon the king as he expected: "How say you?" exclaimed Louis, his eyes flashing fire

"Who has dared to conceive such a thought? Who has had the hardihood to unite himself to Spain, our sworn enemy—our mortal foe? Prove your assertion, sir—prove that such a traitor exists in our dominions; and were he our own brother, we would doom him to death."

Chavigni instantly caught at the idea. "Sorry I am to say, sire," he replied, "that your majesty has but too truly devined the person. The Duke of Orleans, unhappily, is the chief of this dangerous conspiracy. Behold, my liege, his name to this treaty with Spain;" and artfully contriving to conceal the greater part of the names with his hand in holding it before the king, he pointed out the great sprawling "Gaston," which stood the first on the list of signatures.

Louis instantly recognised his brother's handwriting. "Gaston of Orleans! Gaston of Orleans!" he exclaimed, "will nothing satisfy you? Must you betray your country to her enemies, as well as plot against your brother's life with magicians and astrologers?"

We have already had occasion to remark, that Louis, deeply imbued with all the superstitions of the age, put full faith in every part of astrology, and dreaded nothing more than the effects of enchantment. Nor could any thing free his mind from the idea that his brother had, in former times, conspired against his life with certain magicians, who were actually executed for the crime; one amongst others being the famous Père Le Rouge, whom we have more than once noticed in this sage history. The Duke of Orleans himself escaped with a temporary banishment, but the circumstance still rankled in the king's mind; and at present the anger which might, perhaps, have turned aside from Cinq Mars, had Chavigni at first suffered the favourite's name to appear, now burst with full force upon the less favoured Gaston.

"Issue a warrant for his instant arrest," exclaimed the king. "By heaven! he shall not escape more than another man."

"May it please your majesty," answered Chavigni, "to sign the warrant yourself. This is a case of no simple conspiracy, where the king's brother is at its head, and many of the first in the kingdom its supporters ; and the warrants ought not to be simple lettres de cachet of the council, but ought to bear the royal signature."

"Well, sir," replied the king, "have the warrants prepared, and I will sign them. I am going now to hunt, and at my return we will examine these papers and speak further."

"I have the warrants drawn out here," said the statesman, not choosing to let the first impression subside. "It will not detain your majesty a moment ; I felt convinced that you would not allow justice to slumber, and therefore had them prepared. This is against the body of Gaston of France, Duke of Orleans," he continued, looking at one of the papers.

"Well, give it to me," exclaimed the king, taking up a pen ; "it shall be done at once."

Chavigni put the warrant into Louis's hand, and looked at him with intense feeling, and a triumphant smile, as he hastily wrote his signature to it. "Now," thought Chavigni, "I have you, one and all ! Now, proud Cinq Mars, and calculating Bouillon, you are in my power ! He signs the warrant against his own brother, and he dare not let you escape ;" and, countersigning the warrant, he put a second into the king's hand.—"This is against the Duke of Bouillon, sire ;" and he calmly took up the first, and placed it in his portfolio.

"The Duke of Bouillon !" exclaimed Louis, with a sudden start, remembering the orders he had sent him, and terrified lest Richelieu should have discovered them : "is his name to that paper ?"

"No, sire," answered the statesman, "it is not ; but in the treaty itself, there is abundant proof of his concurrence ; and it was on its way to him in Italy when it was discovered. The same messenger bore it that conveyed to him your orders to march his troops into France : " and Chavigni fixed his keen, penetrating glance upon the king's countenance. Louis turned away his head, and signed the warrant, while Chavigni proceeded to place before him that against Fontrailles, and, subsequently, one which authorised the arrest of Cinq Mars.

"How!" exclaimed the king, "here are the first and most loyal men of my kingdom. Monsieur de Chavigni, this is going too far!"

"Their names, my liege," answered Chavigni, "are affixed to the treasonable treaty in my hand."

"It cannot be!" cried Louis, an expression of painful apprehension coming over his countenance; "it cannot be! My faithful, loyal Cinq Mars is no traitor. I will never believe it!" And he threw himself into a seat, and covered his eyes with his hands.

Chavigni opened the treaty calmly, and briefly recapitulated the principal articles. "The first item is, my liege," he proceeded, "that Spain shall instantly furnish ten thousand men to enter France by the way of Flanders; and for a security to his catholic majesty, a second item provides that the Duke of Bouillon shall place in his hands, for the time being, the principality of Sedan. A third goes on to arrange that five principal fortified towns of France shall be given into the hands of Spain; and the whole concludes with a solemn alliance, offensive and defensive, between the conspirators and the Spanish king. And to this treaty," added he, in a firm, deep tone of voice, "stand the names of Cinq Mars and Fontrailles."

"Cinq Mars has been deceived, misled, abused!" cried the king, with a degree of agitation almost amounting to agony.

"That will appear upon his trial, my liege," rejoined Chavigni; and then wishing rather to soften the hard task he called upon Louis to perform, he added, in a gentle manner, "Your majesty was born under the sign Libra, and have always merited the name of Just. If any thing in extenuation of his fault appear in the case of Monsieur le Grand Ecuyer, that can be taken into your merciful consideration after his arrest; but having calmly given an order for the imprisonment of your own royal brother, your majesty cannot—will not show the manifest partiality of letting a person equally culpable escape. May I once more request your majesty to sign the warrant?"

"Well, well!" cried Louis, snatching up the pen. "But remember, Cinq Mars must be pardoned. He has been deceived by that treacherous Duke of Bouillon and that oily Fontrailles. Oh ! he is all honour and loyalty. Have I not experienced a thousand instances of his affection ? It is false ! it is false !” And he dashed down the pen without using it.

Chavigni gazed on him for a moment with a feeling very nearly allied to contempt. “ Well then, your majesty,” he said at length, “ is it your pleasure that I cause the arrest of the dukes of Orleans and Bouillon, with Monsieur de Fontrailles, and others concerned in this conspiracy, and let Monsieur de Cinq Mars know that Louis the Just makes a distinction between him and other men ?”

“ No, no, Chavigni,” replied Louis, mournfully ; “ give me the paper, I will sign it ; but Cinq Mars must be saved. He has been deceived—I will sign it !” and turning away his head, he wrote his name with a trembling hand. But still he continued to hold the warrant, as if unwilling to part with it, repeating more than once, in a tone rather of entreaty than command, “ Indeed, indeed, Chavigni, he must be saved.”

“ Will your majesty look at this part of the treaty, to see that I have stated it correctly ?” said the statesman, offering the papers to the king. Louis laid down the warrant to receive them ; and Chavigni instantly raising the order for the arrest of Cinq Mars from the table, placed it in his portfolio with the rest. Louis saw that it was gone beyond recall, and dropping the treaty from his hands, hid his face in his cloak, with feelings near akin to despair.

Chavigni’s object was gained, and the power of Richelieu re-established. Not only all the conspirators were delivered bound into his hands, but the king himself was virtually in his power. Too weak, as the statesman well knew, to stand alone, or to choose new ministers for himself, Louis had no resource but to yield himself once more blindly to the guidance of the cardinal ; and from the moment he had signed the warrant against Cinq Mars, Chavigni looked upon him but as a royal tool to work out the designs of that great unshrinking politician, who had already so long used him for his own purposes.

The unfortunate monarch, also, was but too well aware of his own want of energy, and of the unsupported situation in which he had left himself; and yielding to his ancient dread of Richelieu, he charged Chavigni with a multitude of exculpatory messages to the minister, calling him his best friend and his cousin, and adding various civil speeches and professions, which both Chavigni and the cardinal knew how to estimate.

"There are many other persons, sire," said the statesman, as he was about to depart, "who are implicated, more or less, in this unhappy conspiracy; but as their guilt is either in a minor degree, or their rank less elevated, I will not trouble your majesty to put your personal signature to the warrants against them. In the mean time, allow me to hint, that the king ought not to be seen hunting with traitors, when they are known to be so."

"No, no," replied Louis, mournfully; "I am in no mood for hunting now. But where go you, Monsieur de Chavigni? You will not leave me for long," added the king, feeling that he must have some one to lean on, and little caring who, so that they yielded him support. "You will not leave me for long in this case of danger."

"I am about to proceed to Corneille," replied Chavigni, "to order up a body of the cardinal's guard. At present I have no escort but a few servants. We are surrounded by the retainers of the different conspirators, and were I to attempt the execution of your majesty's warrants, we might meet with opposition. But I will soon set that at rest, and before to-morrow morning there shall be a thousand men in Narbonne, truly devoted to your majesty's service."

The king gave an involuntary shudder; and Chavigni, with a mockery of profound respect, which he felt but little, took leave and quitted the presence.

The moment he was gone, Louis called to one of the attendants, and carefully shutting the door when he had entered, "François," said he, "you are a silent, cautious man—I can trust you: Go to Monsieur le Grand Ecuier, and, if he is alone, tell him, that France is a climate dangerous for his health—to betake himself elsewhere, and that speedily. But if there is any one with him, merely say, that the king feels himself too unwell to enjoy the pleasures of the chase to-day ; but that he desires his indisposition may not prevent the gentlemen invited from following their sport. This if he be not alone—do you mark me ? But, François, watch well Cinq Mars' return ; find him out when there is no one with him, and give him the first message. Only beware, that in it the king's name is never mentioned. Do you understand ?”

The page bowed profoundly, but still maintained the same unbroken silence, and retired to fulfil the king's commands. The presence of Fontrailles, however, prevented him from delivering the warning, until the master of the horse returned from hunting, when he found an opportunity of speaking to him alone. Such a caution delivered by the king's own page, alarmed the favourite ; and though it was by this time late, he sent a servant to see if the city gates were shut. The servant scarcely gave himself the trouble to inquire, but returning immediately, informed his master that they were. Cinq Mars stayed ; and before the next morning, every avenue from Narbonne was occupied by the cardinal's guard.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

I HAVE known some persons in the world who, gliding quietly through life, have floated on upon the stream of time, like a boat on the waters of a broad and tranquil river, carried on by the unruffled tide of prosperity, and lighted to their journey's end by the cloudless sun of happiness. And I have met with others, whose star seemed to rise in clouds, to hold its course through storms, and to set in blacker darkness than that which gave it birth. But long continued joy loses its first zest, and uninterrupted sorrow its first poignancy ; habit robs even misery of its acuteness ; and care that is long endured, brings along with it the power of longer endurance. It is the sudden transition from joy to sorrow that is the acme of human suffering, adding the bitterness of regret for past enjoyment to all the pangs of present distress.

It was thus with Claude de Blénau. All his wishes had been nearly fulfilled; hope had almost grown into certainty; Pauline was almost his own; when he was snatched from the bosom of joy and security to new scenes of misery and danger. The few last hours came back to his memory like one of those bright visions that sometimes visit our slumber, with every part so truly told, so faithfully drawn, that they become too like reality, and then, when our hearts are full of scenes that we have loved, and pleasures that we have lost, the pageant fades, and we find it but a dream.

When once he had torn himself from Pauline, the objects round him called forth little of De Blénau's attention; and the carriage in which he was placed rolled on for many leagues, before he had sufficiently recovered his tranquillity even to think of the minor points of his situation. The moon, which at their departure shone bright and clear on the broad masses of the forest, had by this time sunk below the horizon; the darkness which had followed her decline had also passed away; the gray streaks of dawn had warmed into the bright blushes of the early morning, and the new-risen sun began to look over a dewy world, that awoke sparkling and smiling, as if for joy at his approach. But the scene which, at any other time, would have called up a thousand remembrances of the happy days and hunter sports of his youth, scarcely now roused him from the reverie in which he was plunged; and if he looked round, or spoke to the person who conducted him, it was merely to ascertain in what direction they were going, or what was the ultimate destination of their journey. Never before had he so completely abandoned himself to despondency; but as a second and third day passed, he began to recover from the first bitterness of his feelings, and endeavoured to draw from the officer the precise crime with which he was charged, and what circumstances of suspicion had arisen against him. But no further information was to be procured. The officer continued firm in the same story he had told the queen—that his orders were to conduct him to Tarascon, and that he was quite ignorant of the circumstances which led to his arrest. And with this De Blénau was obliged to be satisfied.

During the journey the officer showed much civility and attention to the prisoner, though he took good care to place a guard at the door of his chamber when they stopped for the night, which was always at the house of one of those private agents of the government already mentioned, with whose dwellings the officers of the cardinal's guard were generally acquainted. After proceeding, however, for several days, he plainly perceived that nothing could be further from De Blénau's thoughts than any plan for making his escape, and, in consequence, the watch he kept over his prisoner became far less strict, which afforded the count many opportunities of communicating freely with the persons at the various places where they stopped for horses or refreshment.

The arrest of Cinq Mars and several others, with the full restoration of the cardinal's power, was at that moment, in France, one of those topics of wonder and interest, which seem necessary from time to time to keep up the spirits of the gossiping classes of society; and though the good folks at inns and elsewhere found the appearance of a prisoner, escorted by a body of the cardinal's guard, to act as a great check upon their natural loquacity; yet, as the officer was somewhat of a bon vivant, and rather attached to his bottle, the awe inspired by his functions was not so strong as to prevent the news of the grand écuyer's misfortune from reaching the ears of De Blénau, who easily concluded that, from their well-known intimacy, suspicion had fallen upon himself.

The prisoner and his conductors at length began to approach that part of the country where the re-established minister held his court, to which all his old retainers and friends were now flocking, together with many others, who, led by hope or impelled by fear, hastened to offer their servile adulation to a man they in general detested

The roads were thus thronged with people, and many a gay cavalcade passed by the carriage in which De Blénau was borne along; the horsemen looking for a moment into the vehicle out of curiosity, but quickly turning away their eyes again, lest they should be obliged to acknowledge some acquaintance with a person who had fallen under the cardinal's displeasure.

It was night when they arrived at Montolieu, and De Blénau asked his conductor if he intended to stop there till morning.

"No, Monsieur le Comte," replied the officer; "we must proceed as speedily as possible to Mirepoix, where I expect orders for my further conduct."

"Then you go to Tarascon, in the Pyrenees," said De Blénau. "I thought his eminence was at the city of that name by the banks of the Rhone, opposite Beaucaire."

"He was there some time ago," replied the officer; "but he has since gone to the mountains, where, doctors say, there are waters which have great virtues in sickness like his. For my part, I always thought the springs there very bad, and neither fit for man nor beast. But, nevertheless, we must hasten on, sir."

The next place they stopped at was Corneille; and, according to his custom, the officer remained with De Blénau in the carriage, while the troopers arranged every thing that was necessary for proceeding on their journey. There seemed, however, to be a considerable bustle amongst the men; and after waiting patiently for a few minutes, the officer drew back the curtain, and thrusting his head from the window, inquired the cause of delay. The answer he received imported that no fresh horses could be procured, and that those which had drawn them; so far were incapable of proceeding even to the next town. "How happens it that there are no horses?" demanded he impatiently; "there ought always to be horses reserved for the use of the government." To this it was replied, that so many people had passed to the court at Tarascon, that every horse which could be hired, even at an exorbitant price, had been carried away.

The officer paused, as if doubting what course to pursue; but there being no remedy, he was obliged to alight, in order to pass the night at Corneille; taking care, however, to despatch one of the troopers to Mirepoix, to bring any orders which might be waiting for him in that town.

The moon was up, and as De Blénau descended from the carriage, he perceived a little stream dashing and glistening over the wheel of a mill, that stood dark and defined against the moonlight sky. It was to this building they were apparently proceeding; and as they approached nearer, there was seen an irregular part of the edifice projecting from the rest, which seemed appropriated to the particular use of the miller. At the same time, on a wooden staircase, which wound up the outside of the house, appeared a man holding a light, and habited in one of those dusty jackets, which have been the insignia of flour-grinders from all generations. At the moment I speak of, he was holding a conversation with one of the troopers, and, by his quick articulation and busy gestures, seemed engaged in making remonstrances, without any great effect.

"What does he say?" exclaimed the officer, who caught a few words of their conversation as he got out of the carriage. "That we cannot stop here the night? Give him a cuff of the head, Joly, to teach him better manners to the cardinal's guard. By heavens! he shall find me horses to-night, or he shall lodge me till to-morrow!"

"Stay if you will, Sir Officer," rejoined the miller, raising his voice—"but I tell you that you ought not to stay; and as for laying a finger on me—you know I serve the cardinal as well as you, and you dare not!"

"Dare not!" cried the officer, who was by this time mounting the stairs, catching the miller by the collar, and striking him a slight blow. "You are a refractory rascal, sir! Open the door of your house, or I will throw you over the staircase. Come, Monsieur de Blénau, follow me."

The miller offered no resistance, but threw wide the door, and let the officer pass in. De Blénau came next, having taken little notice of the altercation; but as he went by the miller, who held the door open, he heard him mutter to himself in an under voice, "He shall pay for it with his blood!" in a deep bitter tone of determined hatred, that made the count turn round, expecting to see the ferocious countenance of an assassin. Nothing, however, could be more different from the appearance of the speaker, who was a smooth, pale-faced man, whose look expressed little besides peaceful tranquillity and patient resignation.

The room into which they entered was a large uncouth chamber, filled with various articles of household furniture, the unusual assemblage of which showed that it was used for most of the different purposes of life. There was a bed in one corner, with a large screen, or paravent, half drawn before it. Beside the fire hung a row of copper saucepans and cooking utensils; round about were several saddles, and other pieces of horse furniture; and in the centre was a large table, with two or three half-emptied bottles and some glasses, which bore marks of having been recently used; and at the same time a long bench was placed at one side of the table, and three single seats on the other.

On the opposite side of the apartment was a wooden partition, evidently new, which seemed to separate what had once been one large chamber into two, with a door of communication between them.

"Oh, ho! Monsieur Godefroy!" exclaimed the officer, looking at the table, and then turning a significant glance to the miller. "So you have been carousing, and did not like to let us share in your good cheer. But come, we will not be sent away like a dog without his dinner. Let us taste your Burgundy; and if you were to lay three of those plump boudins upon the fire, they might savour the wine."

"You are very welcome, Sir Officer, to any thing the house affords," replied the miller, neither civilly nor sulkily. "Help yourself to the boudins, while I go down for the wine."

"They say in my province, Monsieur de Blénau," said the officer, placing a seat for the prisoner near the fire, "Qui dort dine, et qui fait l'amour soupe. Now, as we have neither slept nor dined, and have no one to make love to, let us sup, at least."

De Blè nau's only reply was, that he had no appetite ; which seemed considerably to surprise the officer, who, as soon as the miller had brought in the wine, and his supper was ready, fell to with no small eagerness, and did not leave off till he had transferred the greater part of the trencher's contents to his stomach. The miller seemed more inclined to follow the officer's example than De Blè nau ; and his anger having apparently subsided, he pressed his guest to continue the meal in so sociable and friendly a manner, that De Blè nau could scarcely conceive that the words he had heard as he entered, had been any thing but the effect of momentary irritation. But shortly after he had again cause to alter his opinion : the eagerness with which the miller invited his companion to drink, producing bottle after bottle of various wines, generally denied by their price to persons in his station of life ; and the subdued glance of triumph with which he viewed the several stages of intoxication at which the officer gradually arrived, caught De Blè nau's attention, and excited his suspicion. However, the vengeance which the miller meditated was of a very different nature from that which the count imagined. Nothing which could, by any chance, recoil upon himself ever entered his thoughts, and his plan reached no further than to render the man who had offended him, deeply culpable in the eyes of Richelieu ; thus calling upon his head that relentless anger which would be much more effectual vengeance than any punishment he could himself inflict.

Two or three hours had passed in this manner, during which time the officer had made various efforts to resist the fascination of the bottle, often pushing it away from him, as if resolved not to taste another drop, and then again, as he became heated in conversation, drawing it back and filling his glass with an almost unconscious hand ; when the sound of a horse's feet was heard without, and starting up, he declared that it was news from Mirepoix, and staggered towards the door.

The moment he had quitted the room, the miller approached De Blè nau, glanced his eyes round the chamber, and then addressed him in a whisper. "What a moment," said he, "for a prisoner to make his escape, while that drunkard's senses are confused with wine!"

De Blè nau started at the suddenness of the proposal, and eyed his companion with an inquiring glance. "If you allude to me," he replied at length, "I thank you, but I have no thought of escaping."

"You have not!" said the miller, apparently surprised. He thought for a moment, and then added—"Oh, you reckon on your innocence. But let me tell you, Sir Count, that there is both danger and uncom fort in a long imprisonment."

"I know it," answered De Blè nau; "but I would rather submit to both, than cast a suspicion on my honour and innocence, by attempting to fly."

This was a sort of reasoning the other did not understand; and his lip curled with a slight expression of contempt, which would have showed itself more visibly, had not De Blè nau's rank, though a prisoner, kept the bourgeois in awe. He turned away, however, seemingly with the intention of quitting the room; but when he got to the other side, he paused, laid his hand upon his brow, and after thinking for a moment, again came back to De Blè nau. "I advise you for your own good, Monsieur le Comte," he said; "and though you will not escape from the dangers of accusation, I will give you the means of proving your innocence. In that room," and he pointed to the small door in the partition, "you will discover two packets of papers exactly similar: take either of them, and in that you will find enough to disprove all that your enemies will say against you."

"But," said De Blè nau, "what right have I to possess myself of papers belonging probably to another?"

"Pshaw!" cried the miller, "one would think that your neck itched for the axe! Are you not in my house? Do not I bid you take them? Of course, you will not betray me to the government; but take the papers, for I give them to you." And making a sign to De Blè nau to use all speed, he went to the door which opened on the road. Before he passed it, however, he turned to the prisoner once more, cautioned him to make no noise, nor regard any thing else in the room, but after having taken one of the packets from the table on which they were placed, to quit it as speedily as possible. The precaution, however, was useless ; for before De Blè nau had even time to determine upon any line of conduct, the officer again entered the room, and, balancing himself as well as he could, contrived to arrive at the table after many a zig-zag and many a halt. He had precisely reached that pitch of intoxication, when a man, having for some time suspected that he is tipsy, finds out that such a supposition was entirely a mistake, and that he never was more sober or more in his senses in his life : consequently, he had not the slightest objection to drink a bottle of the vin de Saint Peret, which the miller set before him ; although the Burgundy he had already imbibed had very considerably dulled his perception, and detracted from his locomotive power. The wine, as it creamed and sparkled in his glass, was raised to his head with increased difficulty at every renewed draught ; and at last, feeling something the matter with him, he knew not what, he started from the table, made an effort to reach a chair by the fire, but receiving instantly internal conviction of the impossibility of the attempt, he cast himself upon the bed behind the screen, which happened to be nearer at hand, and in a few minutes all his senses were steeped in oblivion. Immediately the miller raised his hand, pointed to the door in the partition, and left the apartment as if unwilling to witness what was to follow.

De Blè nau paused for a moment to reflect on this man's conduct ; but however extraordinary it might be, he could see nothing to prevent his possessing himself of papers which, he was assured, would prove his innocence of the crimes with which he was charged—a thing not always easy to the most guiltless. Accordingly, rising from his seat, he passed by the bed where the officer lay snoring in the fulness of ebriety, and opened the door in the partition to which he had been directed. The room with which it communicated was small, and dimly lighted by a lamp that stood flickering on a table, as if it scarcely knew whether to go out or not. Near the lamp lay various implements for writing, together with two papers, one folded up and marked, the other open, and seemingly hardly finished. Around were scattered various basnets and vials, which appeared to contain the medicaments for a sick man; and on one of the chairs was thrown a long sword, together with a poniard and a brace of pistols.

De Blénau advanced to the table, and taking up the open paper, ran his eye hastily over its contents. In so doing, his own name met his sight; and, forgetting the caution he had received, to make speed and quit the apartment as soon as he had possessed himself of it, he could not refrain from reading on:—"With regard to Monsieur the Count de Blénau," the paper proceeded, "the prisoner feels perfectly convinced that he was always ignorant of the treaty and the designs of the conspirators. For Monsieur de Cinq Mars particularly warned him (the prisoner) never to mention the circumstance before the count, because that he was not to be made acquainted therewith; and moreover—"

As De Blénau read, a deep groan came upon his ear, evidently proceeding from some one in the same room with himself, and, holding up the lamp, he endeavoured to discover who it was that had uttered it; but in lifting it suddenly, the feeble light was at once extinguished, and the whole chamber remained in darkness, except where a gleam came through the doorway of the other room.

"Godefroy! Godefroy!" exclaimed a faint voice, "do not put out the light—why have you left me so long? I am dying, I am sure I am dying!"

"I will bring another light," said the count. "and be with you instantly." And forgetting, in the hurry of the moment, his peculiar situation, and the caution which ought to have accompanied it, he hastened into the other apartment, where the officer still lay undisturbed in his drunken slumbers, and taking one of the rosin candles from the table, returned to give what succour he could to the person whose faint voice he had heard.

On re-entering the chamber with the stronger light which he now brought, his eyes fell upon the drawn curtains of an alcove bed at the further extremity; and, approaching quickly, he pulled them back, shading the candle as well as he could, to prevent its glare from offending the eyes of the sick person.

But his precaution was in vain. Light and darkness had become the same to the pale inanimate form before him. De Blénau saw that, during the moment of his absence, being had passed away; and, holding the light nearer to the bed, he thought he could trace, in the disfigured countenance that lay in ashy paleness upon the pillow, the features of the grand écuyer's Italian lute-player, Villa Grande.

He was engaged in examining them more attentively, when some one silently laid their hand upon his arm, and, turning quickly round, he beheld Chavigni, while the countenance of the miller appeared in the doorway very little less pale than that of the dead man. De Blénau's first impulse was to point to the dead man, while his eyes rested on the countenance of Chavigni, in which a slight degree of agitation showed itself for a moment, and then disappeared.

"So!" said the statesman, regarding the lifeless body of Villa Grande, "he is dead, poor wretch!—Gone on that uncertain journey which lies before us all, like a land covered with a thick mist, whose paths, or whose termination, none of us can discover. But to matters of life and moment," he continued. "What do you here, Monsieur de Blénau?"

"I should suppose, sir, that you are better acquainted with the object of my journey than I am myself," replied the count. "You must be well aware it was undertaken against my will."

"You have mistaken me, sir," said Chavigni. "The end of your journey hither, I am well aware of. But how came you in this chamber? What do you with that paper which is in your hand? I expect a straightforward answer."

"Did I give you any, sir," replied De Blénau, "my answer should be straightforward. But you ought to have known me better than so proudly to demand a reply, when you are unentitled to interrogate me. Being a prisoner, I must be guarded as such, though I tell you at once I have no intention of trying to escape; and being defenceless, you may take these papers from me, though they are material proofs of my innocence. However, I will rely upon your justice,—upon your honour,—that whatever charges be brought against me, the confession of this man may be opposed to them in my justification."

"Monsieur de Blè nau," replied Chavigni, "I wish you would sometimes give me an excuse for doubting your sincerity; for then I could see the fate which is likely to betide you, without regret. When you were liberated from the Bastille, I told you that the eye of an angry man was upon you, and warned you as a friend to avoid all cause for suspicion. The minister has never forgotten you; you were the first who brought a shadow over his dominion—I hope, therefore, that your innocence can be proved beyond a doubt; for mercy or tenderness between you and the cardinal is out of the question. Nevertheless, I cannot let you keep this paper, which belongs to the council; but I will take care that any thing which it contains in your favour shall not be lost. In the mean while I shall be obliged to send you to Lyons; and Heaven speed you as safely out of this scrape as out of the last!"

"If perfect innocence of any crime towards the state can save me," said De Blè nau, following Chavigni into the outer room, "I have nothing to fear."

"I hope it is so," replied the statesman. "And now," he continued, turning to the miller, "let me tell you, Master Godefroy, that you are highly culpable yourself, for leaving a state prisoner wholly without guard, when you saw an officer, in whose custody he was, in such a state as this. Make no excuses, sir—it shall be remembered."

Chavigni now approached the drunken man, and tried to rouse him; but finding it in vain, he called in the sergeant, and writing a few words for his warrant, ordered him to conduct the officer next morning to Tarascon, under arrest.

"Monsieur de Blè nau," he continued, turning to the count, "you will do me the favour of accompanying me to Montolieu. The horses attached to my carriage are fresher than those which drew you."

The promptitude with which Chavigni's orders were given brought all the preparations to a rapid conclusion. A few minutes sufficed him to issue the necessary commands for transferring the baggage which had been brought with De Blè nau to the other carriage; and adding a few clear rapid directions to the miller concerning the body of Villa Grande, the statesman was ready to accompany De Blè nau before he had been a quarter of an hour in the house.

At Montolieu, the count was permitted to rest a day, and was then sent forward under a fresh escort to Lyons. The prisoner was now hurried rapidly on his journey, travelling the whole of the first night, and at last only stopping for a few hours to give some repose at a village about eight leagues from the city to which he was proceeding. As soon as daylight dawned, they again began their journey; and taking the lower road by the banks of the Rhone, gradually approached the ancient town of Lyons.

The first pause they made was a compelled one, upon the wooden bridge, situated on the river just below the town. This entrance had been chosen to avoid the more populous suburbs; but the conductor of the escort had been mistaken in his calculation, for owing to some circumstances of general interest, which drew all the idle and the curious to that spot, the bridge and the alleys to it were entirely covered with dense masses of human beings, which completely obstructed the way. With difficulty the carriage was dragged half over the bridge; and then, notwithstanding the exertions of the guard, it was obliged to stop. De Blè nau drew back the leather curtain which obstructed his view, and turning his eyes towards the river, a scene burst upon his sight, which at once explained to him the cause of such an assemblage.

There was a small but magnificent galley making its way slowly to the landing-place. The rigging was adorned with streamers; the deck glittered with all the splendid apparel of a court; the rowers were clothed in rich uniform, scarcely different from that of the guards which flanked each bank of oars; gold, and jewels, and blazonry shone around. But the spot on which all eyes rested was a small canopy of rich embroidery, upheld above the deck, on silver poles, by four officers of the guard, in such a manner as to keep off the rays of the sun, but not to impede the breeze of the river from playing round a pile of rich velvet cushions, on which, amidst the pomp and display of a sovereign prince, lay the emaciated form of the Cardinal de Richelieu. His countenance was calm and unmoved; indeed, he seemed hardly to regard the scene around, listening to the conversation of an abbé, who stood beside him for the sole purpose of amusing him by various tales and anecdotes during the voyage. Sometimes, however, he would raise his eyes and appear to speak to some of those who stood by; and then his glance would rapidly turn towards a smaller boat, which, attached by two long ropes, was towed on at the stern of his own galley. In that boat, seated between two of the cardinal's guard, sat the imprudent and unfortunate Cinq Mars, and his companion in misfortune, De Thou. All the gay, gallant spirit of the master of the horse, which once taught him to scoff at the very idea of adversity as at a bugbear of the imagination, was now quelled and lost; and with a bending head and eyes cast down, he sat perfectly motionless, like a lifeless but elegant statue. De Thou, on the contrary, calmly surveyed the passing scene. He seemed to have forgot that he was there as a prisoner, borne a part of the barbarous triumph which his enemy was enjoying; and, even when his glance met that of the cardinal, his countenance remained undisturbed by any emotion of anger, or any expression of reproach.

I have said that Richelieu would sometimes turn his look towards the boat in which his captives were borne along; and still when he did so, a momentary gleam would lighten in his eyes, and he would hastily glance them round the multitude that lined the shores and the bridge. But there was no sound of gratulation met his ear, no acclamation for his regained ascendancy. The busy whisper of curiosity would stir amongst the people, or perhaps the murmur of compassion, as they gazed upon the victims about to be sacrificed to his vengeance. But there was no love to express; and fear changed their curses into the bitterness of silence.

Such was the scene in the midst of which De Blè nau found himself, when the carriage stopped. He had just time to become aware of all its most painful circumstances, when the guards again opened a way through the people, and the vehicle passed on. The high round tower of Pierre-en-Scize, raising its dark mass above the rest of the prison, was the next thing that met his view, and he doubted not that the place of his imprisonment was before him; but the carriage rolled on into the great Place Terreaux, where it suddenly drew up.

"Then I am not to be taken to Pierre-en Scize?" said De Blè nau to the officer who had accompanied him from Montolieu.

"No, Monsieur le Comte," replied he, "Pierre-en-Scize will be sufficiently occupied with Messieurs Cinq Mars, De Thou, and others; and when Monsieur de Bouillon, and the Duke of Orleans—"

"Good God!" exclaimed De Blè nau, "is the Duke of Orleans implicated in this unfortunate business?"

The officer smiled. "Why, they do say, sir, that the king himself is in the conspiracy. But as to the duke, you know more of his share in it than any one else—at least so we are told. But I must now beg you to descend."

"You are under a mistake, sir," replied De Blè nau. "I know nothing of the duke and as little of the conspiracy." And following the officer, he entered a house in the Place Terreaux, which had been changed for the time from one of the public offices of the city into a place of confinement, and offered all the security without the horrors of a prison. The windows were grated, it is true, but they looked out into the free world below, and the captive might sit there and forget that he was denied the power of joining the gay throng that passed along before his eyes in all the pride of liberty.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

DE BLÉNAU had not been long in his new abode, before he learned that the express orders of Chavigni had caused him to be carried thither, rather than to Pierre-en-Scize, where his confinement would have been more strict ; and he felt grateful for this mark of the statesman's consideration. For the first few days, too, he experienced every kind of attention, and was permitted to enjoy all sort of liberty consistent with his safe custody.

But this was not destined to endure long ; and his imprisonment gradually became more rigorous than that which he had undergone in the Bastille. The use of books and writing materials was denied him, and every means of employing his thoughts seemed studiously withheld. This mode of weakening the mind, by leaving it to prey upon itself, had its effect even on De Blénau. He became irritable and desponding ; and as he received no intimation in regard to the charge against him, he began to conjure up a thousand vague, unreal images, and to destroy them as soon as raised.

After this had continued for some days, he was surprised by the door of his apartment opening one night, at the moment he was about to retire to rest, giving admittance to the corrupt Judge Lafemas, and a person habited as one of the greffiers of the court. There are some who are cruel from fear, and some from motives of interest ; but few, I trust, who from natural propensity rejoice in the sufferings of a fellow-creature. Such, nevertheless was the character of Lafemas—at least if we may believe the histories of the time; and, in the present instance, he entered the chamber of De Blènaux with a countenance which certainly expressed no great unwillingness in the performance of what is always painful when it is a duty.

In this place we shall give but a small part of the conversation between De Blènaux and the judge; for the course of examination which the latter pursued toward the prisoner was so precisely similar in its nature to that which he followed on a former occasion in the Bastille, that its repetition is unnecessary, especially as our history is now hurrying rapidly to its awful and inevitable conclusion. A part of it, however, may serve to illustrate the charges brought against De Blènaux, and the circumstances on which they were founded.

“Good night, Monsieur de Blènaux,” said Lafemas, approaching the table at which he sat. “I did not think to meet you again in prison; I had hoped that when last you escaped so well, you would have been careful to keep yourself free from any thing of this kind.”

“Good night, Monsieur le Juge,” replied De Blènaux; “do me the favour of sitting down—for I suppose I may do the honours of my chamber, though it be but a prison. I am glad to see you, sir; for I trust you can inform me why I am here confined.”

“Monsieur de Blènaux,” said the judge, seating himself. “we will be frank with one another. You are very well aware how deeply you are implicated in this conspiracy; and I will tell you we have ample proofs of every thing. But at the same time I know of a way by which you can save yourself; a way which one or two highly honourable men have embraced, having been misled at first by designing persons, but having returned to a sense of duty and honour, and confessed all they knew, together with the names of those they supposed to be amongst the guilty.”

“I have no doubt, sir,” replied the count, “that all and every thing you say is correct and right. But there is one point, on which I am in the dark. I am not aware of what conspiracy you mean. I have, it is true, conspired ——” Lafemas turned an attentive ear, and De Blènau perceived that the greffier who had followed the judge was making a note of all that passed. “Stop, gentlemen,” said he, nodding to the officer; “take the whole of my sentence, I beg. You shall have it in plain language. I have, it is true, conspired on more than one occasion, with sundry of his majesty’s lieges, to kill a fat buck or a lusty boar, in various of the royal forests in this kingdom. But this is the only conspiracy of which I have been guilty; and for that I can plead his majesty’s free permission and pardon.”

“All this is very good, Monsieur le Comte,” said Lafemas, his brows darkening; “but I must tell you that it will not serve the purpose you propose. I came here to you as a friend——”

“And as a friend,” interrupted De Blènau, “you brought with you that gentleman in black to take down my words, in case I should be at a loss to remember what I had said.”

“I must once more tell you, sir,” said the judge, “that this will not answer your purpose, for a full confession has been made by Monsieur de Cinq Mars since his condemnation.”

“Since his condemnation!” exclaimed De Blènau. “Good God! is it possible that he is condemned?”

Lafemas was little capable of understanding any of those finer feelings which brighten the dull void of human existence. He read from the black page of his own mind, and fancied that every other was written in the same dark character. All that he saw in the exclamation of De Blènau was fear for himself, not feeling for his friend; and he replied, “Yes, Monsieur le Comte, he is condemned to lose his head for the crimes of which he has been guilty: the Question also formed part of his sentence, but this he has avoided by making a full confession, in which, as you may easily suppose, your name is very fully comprised.”

may indeed be true that my unhappy friend is guilty and has confessed his guilt ; but no language you can use will ever persuade me that, knowing my innocence, as he well does, he would say any thing that could implicate me. I will further answer every thing that can possibly be asked of me in a very few words. As to myself, I have nothing to confess, for I am perfectly guiltless towards the state : and as to others, I can give no information, for I am wholly ignorant of any plot, conspiracy, or treason, whatsoever."

"I am sorry for your obstinacy, Monsieur de Blénau," said Lafemas rising ; "for the cardinal has resolved that you shall confess, and we have the means of making the most stubborn answer. I am, in fact, commanded this very night to use measures which might not be very agreeable to you. But I give you till to-morrow to consider, and so bid you farewell."

The plans of Cinq Mars had run into various ramifications, involving a multitude of persons in a greater or less degree ; but all fell equally under the hatred of the cardinal, and he spared no means, legal or illegal, to discover the most remote windings of the conspiracy, and to force or induce the various parties to it to make confessions, which were afterwards used as evidence against themselves, as well as others. As the proofs against De Blénau were, of course, very defective, the last command of Richelieu to Lafemas, before leaving Lyons, was to spare no power of intimidation, in order to make the prisoner criminate himself, before even granting him the form of a trial. In pursuance of these directions, Lafemas ceased not for some days to torment De Blénau with continual interrogatories, mingled with menaces and irritation, ingeniously calculated either to frighten his victim into some confession of guilt, or to throw him off his guard by rousing his anger. More than once he was carried into the chamber of the Question, and once was even bound to the rack. But though, in the secret halls of the Bastille, Lafemas would not have scrupled to proceed to any act of cruelty, yet at Lyons, amidst people upon whose silence he could no rely, he dared not put the prisoner to the question, without some appearance of legal authority. At length, therefore, the day for his trial was fixed; but yet Lafemas prepared to make him previously undergo a species of refined torture, which none but a demon could have devised.

Denied all the privileges usually conceded to prisoners, unacquainted with the precise charges to be brought against him, refused all legal assistance, and debarred the use of pen and ink, De Blénau clearly saw that Richelieu had resolved on his destruction, and merely granted him the form of a trial to gloss over his tyranny in the eyes of the people; nevertheless, he prepared to defend himself as far as possible, and at all events to establish his innocence for the honour of his good name, though it might not even tend to save him from the injustice with which he was threatened. For this purpose he accurately examined his conduct since his liberation from the Bastille, and noted carefully every circumstance, in order to prove the nature of all his occupations so correctly, that the impossibility of his joining in any conspiracy would be made evident. He found, however, that to do this effectually, some aid besides that of mere memory would be necessary, and possessing no other means of committing his thoughts to writing, he had recourse to the expedient of pointing some pieces of wood, which he procured from the gaoler, and then by charring them in the lamp, he was enabled to make notes upon some torn linen, preparatory to his trial. Being thus occupied the greater part of the night, his usual time of rest was from daybreak to mid-day; but one night, a few days previous to the time appointed for his trial, he was disturbed in his occupation by the dull, heavy clang of hammers in the great square before his prison, and proceeding to the window, he endeavoured to ascertain the cause. Through the bars he could perceive various lights, and people moving about in different directions, but could not discern in what they were employed; and quitting the casement, he returned to the slow and laborious operation of writing his notes, in the manner we have described. At length, wearied out, he threw himself upon his bed, without taking off his clothes, and soon fell into a profound sleep, which remained unbroken till late the next day. It is probable that he might have slept still longer, had he not been aroused by his tormentor, Lefemas, who, standing by his bedside, with two of his inferior demons, roused him out of the happy forgetfulness into which he had fallen. "Rise, Monsieur de Blènau, rise!" said the Judge, his eyes gleaming with malicious pleasure; "rise! here is something in the Place which it is necessary you should behold."

De Blènau awoke suddenly from his sleep, suffered himself to be conducted to the window, where the judge and his two followers placed themselves behind him, so as to obstruct his retreat, and in a manner to force upon him the sight of what was passing in the Place.

The square of Terreaux was filled with an immense multitude, and there was a deep, awful silence reigned amongst them. All eyes were turned towards a spot exactly opposite the window at which De Blènau stood, where there appeared a high raised scaffold, covered with black cloth, and surrounded by a strong body of troops, who kept the multitude at a distance, without impeding their view of the dreadful scene which was acting before them. A large log of timber lay across the front of the scaffold, and beside it stood a tall brawny man, leaning on an immense axe, which seemed as if a giant's force would hardly wield it, so ponderous was its form. The prevost of Lyons, dressed in black, and bearing his staff of office, stood on the other side with several of the civil officers of the city; and a file of pikemen closed each flank of the scaffold, leaving the front open, as we have said, to the view of the spectators.

But it was the form of his unhappy friend, Cinq Mars, that first riveted De Blènau's attention; and he continued to gaze upon him with painful interest, while, standing beside the block on which he was to suffer, he calmly unloosed his collar, and made the executioner cut away the glossy curls of his hair, which otherwise, falling down his neck, might have impeded the blow of the axe. When this was over, Cinq Mars raised the instrument of his death, and running his finger over the edge, seemed to ascertain that it was sharp; and then laying it down, he turned to the good De Thou, who stood beside him, a sharer in his punishment, though not a sharer in his fault. Cinq Mars appeared to entreat his pardon for some offence; and it is probable that having implicated him at all in the conspiracy, was the only circumstance that then weighed upon the mind of the grand écuyer. The only reply of De Thou was a warm affectionate embrace; and then, with the easy dignity of a mind at rest, Cinq Mars withdrew himself from his arms, and knelt down before the block—De Blè nau turned away his head.

You had better observe, Monsieur de Blè nau," said Lafemas, "the fate which those two traitors undergo; for such will be your own, if you refuse the hand of mercy held out to you, and persist in obstinate silence. Ah!—so much!" continued he, looking from the window, "so much for Monsieur de Cinq Mars! That new fellow is expert—he has the head off at one blow!"

"Wretch!" exclaimed De Blè nau, forcibly passing him, and proceeding from the window, "unfeeling wretch!—Monsieur Lafemas," he added, after pausing a moment, "you were perhaps right in supposing that this torture was superior to any other you could inflict. But I have once more to tell you, sir, that by this or by any other means you will wring from me nothing that can betray my innocence or my honour."

"Then die as you deserve!" replied Lafemas; and after once more looking from the window, and muttering to himself a few words, whose import De Blè nau did not catch, he left the apartment with his two followers. De Blè nau cast himself on the bed, and hiding his face in the clothes, endeavoured to drive from his memory the dreadful scene he had just beheld; but it still continued for many an after-hour to hover before his eyes, and deprive him of all rest or peace.

The hours of a prison are always slow, and they were now doubly slow to De Blénau, having no other pastime than painful reflections, and anticipations equally bitter.

At length, however, the day of his trial arrived, and he was conveyed in a carriage to Pierre-en-Scize, where, in the hall of audience, sate three of the devoted creatures of Richelieu, presiding over a body equally governed by themselves, and all prepared to pronounce a sentence already dictated by the minister. Although the president of the parliament of Grenoble nominally directed the business of the court, Lafemas was not absent, and in his eyes Blénau instantly discerned his fate.

The charge against the prisoner was read by one of the clerks, declaring him to stand in danger of high treason, in having conspired with the Sieurs Cinq Mars, Fontailles, De Thou, and others, to bring foreign troops into France, and for having treated and combined with a power at open war with the kingdom for various treasonable and disloyal purposes.

The evidence brought forward to establish this was as frivolous as the accusation was unfounded. Even the very semblance of justice was nearly abandoned, the judges seeming to go through the trial as a useless and tiresome ceremony, which might very well be dispensed with.

It was proved, indeed, that the prisoner had often been seen in private with the unfortunate Cinq Mars; and it was also given in evidence by a servant of the Duke of Orleans, that he had carried a letter from that prince to De Blénau at Moulins; and in consequence of that letter, as he conceived, the duke had gone, with a great air of secrecy, to a particular spot, where he was unaccustomed to ride upon ordinary occasions, and that there he was met by De Blénau. What conversation took place between them, he could not tell; but after they had separated, the duke, he said, gave particular orders that their meeting should be mentioned to no man.

The next witness brought forward was the messenger who had carried to De Blénau the king's permission to return to court, and who proved that, instead of finding the count at Moulins, or any where in the Bourbonnais to which, according to the king's command, he was bound to confine himself, he had been conducted by the count's page to Troyes in Champagne, where he found Monsieur de Blénau himself ready to set off for some other place. This witness also added, that he had learned in the town of Troyes, that Monsieur de Blénau had been absent one whole day, during which time he had visited the old Castle of Mesnil St Loup; and that at his return he did not go to the same hotel from which he had proceeded in the morning.

When the evidence was gone through, the president of Grenoble signified to the prisoner that he might speak in his own defence; and though well assured that on his judges he could make no impression, De Blénau resolved not to allow the accusation to remain unrepelled, and replied at some length to what had been urged against him. He showed the impossibility of preparing any defence, when the nature of the charge had never reached his ears till that day. He pointed out that, though he had known and loved the unhappy Cinq Mars, their friendship was no proof that he was at all acquainted with the conspiracy for which the other had suffered; and that though he had met the Duke of Orleans, and received a letter from him, that was not sufficient to show him concerned in any plot against the state. He acknowledged that he had left the Bourbonnois without the king's permission; but he stated the powerful motives which had induced him to do so, and gave a correct account, from the notes he had prepared, of every moment of his time since he had been liberated from the Bastille. He further declared his innocence: he proved that he had been absent from all the principal scenes of the conspiracy; and ended by demanding that the confession of the Italian Villa Grande should be produced.

The president of Grenoble turned his eyes upon Lafemas; but that worthy judge assumed an air of perfect unconsciousness, and demanded, what Italian the prisoner meant?

De Blénau now clearly and distinctly stated all he knew concerning him, and again demanded that his confession should be brought forward. But still Lafemas appeared in doubt. "Monsieur de Blè nau," said he, "although this seems to me but a manœuvre to gain time, I have no objection that the papers of this court should be searched, if you can give us the baptismal name of this Italian, of whom at present we know nothing; and even this is a matter of grace and favour."

De Blè nau declared his incapacity to do so, but protested against the unjust proceedings of the court, and showed that, if time and opportunity had been allowed for preparing his defence, he would have been enabled, by application to the Count de Chavigni, to bring forward the paper he mentioned, and to prove the truth of every thing he had asserted, by the evidence of a person now at a distance. He was still speaking when Lafemas rose and interrupted him. "Perceiving," said the judge, with unblushing effrontery, "that the prisoner has concluded his defence, I will now occupy the court for a few moments, in order to explain the reasoning on which my own opinion is founded, although I see but one conclusion to which any one can come upon the merits of the case before us. It has been shown that the prisoner was the sworn—the bosom friend of the traitor who has already suffered for his crimes; that he was in constant communication with almost all the conspirators; and that the royal duke, who has unfortunately dyed his name with so black a spot, at the very same time that he was engaged in plotting the ruin of his country, was in secret correspondence with the individual before us. It has further been proved, that the prisoner, after having been relegué in Bourbon, quitted the place to which he was bound to confine himself, and went upon what he cannot but own himself to be a wild romantic chase, into Champagne. This part of his story is a very strange one, according to his own showing; but when we come to compare it with the confession of the traitor Cinq Mars, the matter becomes more clear. It was in the old castle of St. Loup, near the city of Troyes, says the confession, that the principal meeting of the conspirators were held ; and it was to this very castle of St. Loup that the prisoner directed his course from Moulins. Evidently for the purpose of concealment also, the prisoner, on his return to Troyes, instead of directing his course to the inn where he had formerly alighted, proceeded to another, at which, unfortunately for himself, he was overtaken by the king's messenger. I think it is unnecessary to say more upon these points. To my mind they are convincing. It is true, indeed, Monsieur de Blè nau has shrewdly kept his handwriting from any paper which could prove him an active member of this conspiracy. But what man in his senses can doubt that he was criminally aware of its existence? This, then, is his crime: and I pronounce the concealment of treason to be as great a crime as treason itself. But if there were wanting a case in point to prove that the law considers it as such, I would cite the condemnation of De Thou, who, but two days ago, suffered with the traitor Cinq Mars. Let us now, my brethren," he added, "retire to consider of our sentence; for I have only spoken thus much, not to bias your opinion, but simply that the prisoner himself, before he leaves the court, may know, at least, my sentiments."

The judges now withdrew to the cabinet appointed for their deliberations, and De Blè nau was removed from the court to a small apartment hard by. He had not been here a moment, when his page, Henri de la Mothe, burst into the room. "My dear, dear master!" exclaimed the boy, throwing himself at his feet, "they tell me that you certainly will not be condemned, for that you have not been taken to what is called the dead man's dwelling: so the sentinel let me in to see you."

"Heury! how came you hither?" exclaimed De Blè nau, hurriedly.—"But we have no time to think of that—my fate is sealed—I have read it in the triumphant glance of that demon Lafemas. Mark me, my boy, and if ever you loved me, obey me well. When I am dead—do you hear?—When I am dead, near my heart you will find a portrait. Take it, with this ring, to Mademoiselle de Beaumont. Tell her, that the one was the likeness of all I loved on earth; and the other, the ring that was to have bound her to me for ever. Say that De Blè nau sends them to her in death, and that his last thought was of Pauline de Beaumont."

"Alas! Mademoiselle de Beaumont!" said the page. But as he spoke, the door opened, and an officer of the court entered, followed by a priest. "Begone, boy!" said the officer, leading Henry to the door. "How came you in here? We have more serious matter in hand now."

"Remember!" said De Blè nau, holding up his hand impressively, "remember!" And Henry, bursting into tears, was hurried from the apartment. "Now, father," continued De Blè nau, turning to the priest, "let us to your business."

"It is a sad one, my son," he replied; "it is but to tell you, that you must prepare to leave a world of sorrow!"

"God's will be done!" said De Blè nau.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

ALL delay in the execution of a sentence where there exists no hope for mercy, is but needless cruelty; yet De Blè nau was suffered to linger fourteen weary nights and days between the day of his condemnation and that appointed for his death. It approached, however, at length. We are told, by those who have had the best opportunities of judging, that the last night of a condemned prisoner's existence is generally passed in slumber. It was so with De Blè nau. Hope and fear were equally things gone by to him. The bitter sentence of death rung in his ear. He had traced the last lines of affection to her he loved; he had paid the last duties of religion; and, fatigued with the strong excitement which his mind had undergone, he threw himself on his couch, and fell into that profound sleep which only despair can give, and which approaches near to annihilation.

He was yet buried in forgetfulness when the gaoler came to announce that the fatal hour was come, and for a moment, even after his spirit had resumed her powers, memory still wandered far from the reality. He had not dreamed, but all thought of the last few months had been obliterated, and remembrance, escaping from the painful present, lingered fondly over all he had left behind.

It lasted not long, and as all the truth came rushing on his mind, he thought alone of his approaching fate, and to meet it as became him. His heart, indeed, was sick of all the instability of this world's things, and for an instant there was a feeling almost amounting to satisfaction, when he thought that the eternal balancing between hope and fear, between joy and disappointment, was soon to be over, and that his soul, wearied of change and doubt, would quickly have peace and certainty. But then again the lingering ties of earth, the fond, warm fellowships of human existence, came strongly upon him, with all the throng of kindly sympathies that bind us to this world, and made him shrink from the thought of breaking them all at once.

This also lasted but a moment—his fate was sealed, and hurrying over all that might in any degree undermine his fortitude, he followed into the courtyard, where the Prevost de Lyons and several authorities of the town, with a file of soldiers, waited his coming.

The distance was so short from the place of his confinement to the scaffold where he had beheld for the last time his unhappy friend Cinq Mars, that the use of a carriage was dispensed with; and the guard having formed an avenue through the crowd, the gates were thrown open to give him exit for the last time.

"Monsieur de Blè nau, will you take my arm?" said the Prevost of Lyons: "mine is a sad office, sir but the arm is not an unfriendly one."

De Blè nau, however, declined it with thanks, saying that he needed no support; and with a priest on one hand and the prevost on the other, he proceeded calmly towards the scaffold, and ascended the steps with a firm unshaken footstep. The block, and the axe, and the masked executioner were nothing in De Blénau's eyes but the mere weak precursors of the one awful event on which all his thoughts were bent, and for which his mind was now fully prepared. There was but one thought which could at all shake his fortitude—there was but one tie to be broken which wrung his heart to break. He thought of Pauline de Beaumont—but he thought also that he had merited a better fate; and, proudly spurning the weakness that strove to grow upon his heart, he resolved to die as he had lived, worthy of her he loved. The very feeling gave new dignity to his air, and he stood erect and firm while the soldiers were disposed about the scaffold, and his sentence was read aloud by the prevost.

A great multitude surrounded the place, and fixed their eyes upon the victim of arbitrary power, as he stood calm and unmoved before them, in the spring of youth and the dignity of conscious innocence. There were few who had not heard of the Count de Blénau, and all that they had heard was good. The heart of man, too, although fallen, has still one spot reserved for the dwelling of compassion, and its very weakness makes it soften to virtue in distress, and often even to forget faults in misfortunes. However that may be, there was a glistening in the eyes of many as they turned their looks towards De Blénau, who, according to the universal custom of the time, advanced to the front of the scaffold to address them. "Good freinds," said he, "it is the will of Heaven that here I should give back the spirit which has been lent me; and so help me that God into whose bright presence I now go, as I am innocent of any crime towards my king and country!" A murmur ran among the people. "This is my last asseveration," he continued; "and my last counsel to you is, to keep your hearts clear and guiltless, so that if misfortune should follow any one as it has followed me, he may be able to lay his head upon the block as fearlessly as I do now!" And retiring a step, he unloosed his collar, and knelt for the stroke of the executioner.

"A horse! a horse! A council messenger! Pardon for the count! Pardon for the count!" cried a thousand voices from the crowd. De Blè nau looked up. Head-long down the long narrow street that then led in a straight line from the square, his horse in foam, his hat left far behind, and his long gray hair flying in the wind, spurring as if for life, came a horseman, who ever and anon held up a packet in his hand, and vociferated something that was lost in the distance. He wore the dress of a lieutenant of the king's forests, and dashing like lightning through the crowd, that reeled back on every side as he approached, he paused not till he reached the foot of the scaffold—threw himself from his horse—passed unopposed through the guards—rushed up the steps, and Philip the woodman of Mantes cast himself at De Blè nau's feet. "My noble, noble lord!" exclaimed the woodman. It was all that he could utter, for his breath was gone with the rapidity of his progress.

"What is all this?" cried the prevost of Lyons, coming forward. "And why do you stop the execution of the prisoner, Sir Lieutenant? What is all this?"

Philip started on his feet. "What is it?" he exclaimed: "why, that none of you blood-sucking wolves dare put a fang to the count's throat: that's what it is! There is his pardon, with the king's own signature; ay, and the cardinal's to boot! At least, so Monsieur de Chavigni tells me; for being no great clerk, I have not read it myself."

The prevost unfolded the paper and read, "'Aujourd'hui,' &c.—Ah! yes, all in form.—'The king having learned that the crimes of the Sieur Claude de Blè nau, Count de Blè nau, and Seigneur de Blancford, are not so heavy as at first appeared, and having investigated, &c. has ordained and does ordain—out of his great grace, &c.—that the sentence of death be changed and commuted to perpetual banishment, &c.—And if after sixteen days from the date hereof, he be found within the kingdoms of France and Navarre,' &c.—You understand, Monsieur le Comte. Well, sir, I congratulate you. Here is the king's name; 'Louis,' et plus bas, 'Richelieu.'—Will you come and take some refreshment at my poor lodgings?"

De Blè nau was glad to accept the invitation, for his mind was too much confused to fix upon any plan of action at the moment. His resolution had borne him strongly up at the time when all hope seemed lost; but now the sudden change overpowered him; and amidst the acclamations of the multitude, he suffered himself to be conducted in silence to the house of the prevost, where he was soon after discovered by his page, Henri de La Mothe.

We shall now pass quickly over the means which he took to procure money for the expenses of the journey before him, merely saying that, through the kindness of the prevost, he was soon furnished with the necessary funds for proceeding; and accordingly set out from Lyons the second morning after that, the events of which we have described. Two powerful reasons induced De Blè nau to turn his steps towards Spain: in the first place, it was much nearer than either Germany or Flanders, which were the only other countries where he could hope for perfect security; and, in the next place, his road to the frontier passed not only close to his own estates, but skirted the property of Madame de Beaumont, and he was not without hopes of meeting there some that were the dearest to him on the earth; for he learned from Hen ride La Mothe, that the vengeance of the implacable Richelieu had extended to Pauline and her mother, who had been ordered once more to quit the court of France, as a punishment for having conveyed information to him in the Bastille.

Philip the woodman was not forgotten in De Blè nau's new arrangements; and under the pretence of charging him with a letter back to St. Germain, in case Madame de Beaumont should not be in Languedoc, the young count seduced him into a promise of accompanying him to Argentiè re. His real motive, however, was to recompense the woodman's services, on arriving at his own property, in a manner which the scanty state of his finances prevented him from doing at Lyons.

Notwithstanding all the joy he felt at his deliverance, there was a heaviness hung over De Blè nau as he rode out of Lyons, which he could not account for, and a sensation of fatigue which he had never felt before. To shorten the road, he beckoned to the woodman, who, with Henri de La Mothe, had dropped a little behind, and made him relate the circumstances which led to his being despatched with the king's pardon to Lyons. Philip's story, which occupied a long while in telling, may be considerably shortened without disadvantage.

It must be remembered, that at the time of De Blénau's liberation from the Bastille, Chavigni had promised, as some compensation for all that Philip had suffered by his means, to have him appointed as sous-lieutenant of the forest of Mantes; and he kept his word.

Philip was placed in the office, and exercised its functions, but the actual brevet containing his official appointment had been delayed by a multitude of other affairs pressing for attention, till the statesman's return from Narbonne. At length Philip heard that Chavigni had returned, and that the king, with all the ministers, were once more at St. Germain; and he ventured to wait upon his patron, as he had been desired, to remind him of expediting the brevet. There were several persons waiting, and in his turn he was shown into the statesman's cabinet.

Chavigni had forgotten his face, and asked the simple question, "Who are you?"

Such simple questions, however, often produce more important consequences. "I am the woodman," replied Philip, "who was in prison with the Count de Blénau."

"The Count de Blénau!" exclaimed Chavigni, while an expression of horror passed over his countenance. "By all the saints, I had forgot! Yet, let me see—to-day is Wednesday—there is yet time—stay here a moment!" and he rushed out of the room, leaving the astonished woodman not knowing at all what he meant. In about a quarter of an hour the statesman returned, breathless with the expedition he had used. "There!" he exclaimed, putting a paper into Philip's hand—"there is his pardon, signed by both the king and the cardinal!—Away! take the swiftest horse in my stable!—lose not a moment, or you will be too late! Use the king's name for fresh horse^m and show that signature. Tell the count, Chavigni has ~~kept~~^{lost} his word."

"And where am I to go?" demanded Philip, quietly, still completely ignorant of the cause of Chavigni's agitation.

"To Lyons, to Lyons! you fool!" cried Chavigni. "If you use not all speed, the count's head will be off before you arrive with his pardon."

"The Count de Blénau?" demanded Philip.

"Yes, yes, I tell you!" reiterated the statesman; "your good old friend, the Count de Blénau! So lose no time, if you would save his life."

Philip lost no time, and arrived at Lyons, as we have seen, just at the critical moment of De Blénau's fate.

Though Philip's narrative served to interest De Blénau, and the chattering of Henri le Mothe to amuse him on the way, nevertheless he could not conceal from himself that there was a lassitude gradually growing upon him, which seemed to announce the approach of some serious sickness. Naturally of a strong constitution, and an ardent temperament, he never yielded to indisposition, till unable to sustain it any longer; and though fatigue, anxiety, and distress, had weakened him much, and his two attendants often hinted that he looked unwell, and required repose, De Blénau would not acknowledge that he was ill, until he arrived in the neighbourhood of Tournon. There, however, the powers of nature failed him, and he felt that he could proceed no further. Scarcely able to sit his horse, he entered the town, and looked eagerly about for some place where he could repose, when suddenly the eyes of Henri de la Mothe rested upon the well-known sign of the Sanglier Gourmand, which, as they afterwards found, was still kept by no other person than the celebrated Jacques Chatpilleur, who had at last been driven from the neighbourhood of the Bastille by the wrathful governor, for one of his drunken achievements, very similar to the one previously recounted, and had taken refuge in his native place, Tournon. Here De Blénau alighted, and was conveyed to a bedchamber, where he was soon attacked by a violent fever, which rapidly increased. Delirium followed; and he quickly lost all remembrance of surrounding objects, though the name of Lafayette de Beaumont would often tremble on his tongue.

In about twenty days the disease had run its course and passed away, leaving him in a state of excessive weakness; but, in the meantime, the fever, which had nearly destroyed De Blénau, had entirely ruined the unhappy Jacques Chatpilleur. The report spread through Tournon that the aubergiste had a malignant sickness raging in his house; and instead of coming thither as usual for the good things of this life, the citizens carefully avoided his side of the street. For some days after he discovered this defection melancholy preyed upon him; but suddenly he resolved to pull down his sign, put by his pots and pans, and resume his gaiety; and no sooner did Blénau talk of once more proceeding than the aubergiste laid before him his sad condition, and prayed, as an act of justice, that he would take him with him into Spain, and suffer him to act as his cook.

De Blénau had not the heart to deny him: but another thing came now to be considered. The time which, according to the royal ordinance, had been allowed him to quit the realm, had long expired, and he was now virtually an outlaw. Every one was called upon to deliver him up, and his life was beyond the protection of the laws. These circumstances would, perhaps, have given De Blénau little concern had not the Judge Lafemas been still in his neighbourhood. But from his vindictive spirit he had everything to fear if discovered within the precincts of France; and in consequence he determined to travel by night when his strength was sufficiently restored, and to effect his escape into Spain without delay. Chatpilleur did his best to restore his new lord to robust health, and his efforts were crowned with success. In the meantime Henry de la Mothe took care to prepare secretly everything for their departure; and Philip the woodman, after balancing between a wish to return to his family and love for the good young count, determined to follow him to the frontier. Accordingly, one clear autumn night, towards twelve o'clock, De Blénau quitted the little town of Tournon, accompanied by the innkeeper, the woodman, and the page, and proceeding cautiously, arrived safely in the neighbourhood of La Voulte, where the party, entering a large open field, reposed themselves under the mulberry-trees which, although stripped both of their green leaves and of their silken balls, offered some degree of concealment. At noon, Chatpilleur was despatched to the town for provisions, which commission he executed with zeal and discretion, and returning, informed De Blènaux that he had seen a gentleman in black pass through the town, accompanied by a considerable train similarly habited.

As De Blènaux conjectured that this might be Lafemas, he determined to take additional precautions, and rather to live upon scanty fare than send into any town again; and setting off as soon as it was dark, they passed by Privas, and reached the skirts of the thick wood that began about Aubenas, and sweeping round La Gorce, extended almost to Viviers on one side and to L'Argentière on the other. Near to Viviers lay the estates of the Marchioness de Beaumont, and within a league of Argentière was the Château de Blènaux; but it was towards the former that De Blènaux bent his steps at nightfall. Before they had gone far it began to rain hard, and the wood afforded but indifferent shelter, except at a spot where two evergreen oaks, growing together, spread their branches over a considerable space of ground. De Blènaux was inclined to proceed as quickly as possible; but Chatpilleur so strongly cautioned his lord to avoid the wet, that the whole party betook themselves to the shelter of the oaks.

After about half an hour of heavy rain the moon began to shine once more; and De Blènaux was about to proceed, when the sound of horses was heard upon the very path which they had just passed. De Blènaux and his party drew back as quietly as possible behind the trees, and though the horses' feet still made some noise, the water dropping from the branches of the forest served to cover the sound. Scarcely, however, were they themselves concealed, when a horseman appeared on the road in a sombre suit, with some one riding on his right hand, apparently an inferior, from the bending position in which he listened to what the other said. Six servants followed at a little distance, and a straggler brought up the rear, wringing the wet from the skirts of his doublet. One by one they passed slowly by: the uncertain light showing them to be well armed and mounted, but still not shining sufficiently to give of a good view of their features, though De Blénau thought that the form of the first rider was not unfamiliar to him. It was not unlike that of Lafemas, yet, as far as he could judge, taller and more erect. The cavalcade passed on, and wound down the road in the moonlight, till they came opposite to a spot where some felled timber and blocks of stone embarrassed the ground. Immediately they arrived there, there was a bright flash, the report of a carbine, and one of the horses fell suddenly to the ground. In a moment, nine or ten horsemen, and two or three on foot, rushed forth from the wood; and the clashing of steel, the report of pistols, and various cries of wrath or agony, came sweeping upon the gale. "The robbers are upon them, as I live!" cried De Blénau: "were it Lafemas himself this must not be! En avant pour la France!" and dashing his rowels into his horse's sides, he galloped headlong down the road, followed by the woodman, the page, and the redoubtable Jacques Chatpilleur.

Two moments brought them to the scene of the combat; and the moon then shining out brightly, the one party was easily distinguished by their black habits, the other by their rusty cuirasses and morions. Directly in the way of De Blénau was the cavalier he had marked as he passed, contending with a man of almost gigantic strength; but, notwithstanding the superior force of the latter, his antagonist still foiled him by his skilful defence, when suddenly one of the robbers on foot attacked the cavalier from behind. Thus beset, he turned to strike him down, when the tremendous Norman (for it was no other) caught his bridle rein, and urging the horse back, threw him to the ground. The robber on foot shortened the pike he carried to plunge it in his body. But by this time De Blénau's party had come up, and the courageous aubergiste galloping on, bore the point of his long sword in a direct line forward, which catching the pikeman just below the cuirass, spitted him, to use Chatpilleur's own expression, just like a widgeon.

In the meanwhile, the Norman had turned upon De Blè nau, and snapped a pistol at his head, which, however, missed fire. Enraged at this, he threw the weapon from him, and spurring on his horse, aimed a tremendous blow at the count, which was instantly parried, and returned by a lunge that cut him above the eye, and deluged his face in blood. Mad with the pain and half-blinded with the gore, Marteville attempted once more the feat by which he had overthrown his former antagonist; and, catching De Blè nau's rein, urged his horse back with Herculean strength. In vain the count spurred him forward; the beast sank on his haunches, and was floundering in the fall, when De Blè nau, finding it inevitable, let go the rein, fixed his knees firm in the saddle, and raising his sword with both hands, let it fall with all his force upon the head of the Norman. The true steel passed clear on, hewed through the iron morion, cleft through hair and skull, and sank deep into the brain. He reeled in the saddle; his hands let go their grasp, and he fell headlong to the ground, while the horse of De Blè nau, suddenly released from the pressure, rose up, and plunging forward, trod him under his feet. De Blè nau lost not his presence of mind for a moment, and while his horse was yet in the spring, aimed a blow at the Gros St. Nicolas, who had been hurrying to the assistance of his captain, which disabled his shoulder, and threw him from his horse. "Sauve qui peut!" cried the robber, starting up on his feet and running for the wood: "the captain is dead!" "Sauve qui peut!" rang among the robbers, and in a few minutes De Blè nau and his party were left the masters of the field. The count drew up his horse, exclaiming, "Do not follow them: let us look to the wounded;" and dismounting, he hurried to assist the fallen cavalier, who was struggling to disengage himself from his horse.

"Next to God, sir, I have to thank you," said the stranger, as soon as he had risen. "But—is it possible? Monsieur de Blè nau!" he exclaimed, as the moonlight gleamed on the countenance of the count. "Merciful Heaven! I thought you were in Spain long ago!"

"Monsieur de Chavigni! or I am mistaken," said De

Blénau. "But I know that I can trust to your honour, and therefore must say that, though my late illness may have rendered me an outlaw, by detaining me in France after my sentence of exile, yet I will not regret it, as it has given me the opportunity of serving the man to whom I am indebted for my life. There, sir, is my hand."

Chavigni embraced him warmly. "Let us look to the men who are wounded, Monsieur de Blénau," said he, "and then I will give you a piece of news which, however painful to me, must be satisfactory to you. Cannot some one strike a light, that we may examine more carefully what has occurred on this unhappy spot? for I see many on the earth."

Thereupon Jacques Chatpilleur, who had already collected some dry wood, now quickly produced a fire by means of the flint of a pistol.

The scene that presented itself was a sad one. On the earth lay two of Chavigni's servants dead, and one desperately wounded. To these was added Henri de la Mothe, who had received a severe cut on the head, and was stunned with the blow. Not far from the body of the Norman lay his companion Callot, who was the pikeman despatched by the bellicose aubergiste. In addition to those was a robber whose head had been nearly severed from his body by the cutlass which was borne by Philip the woodman; and one so severely wounded by a pistol-ball from the hand of Chavigni that his companions had been obliged to abandon him. From him they learned that the attack upon Chavigni had been preconcerted; that understanding he was bending his steps towards Montpellier, Marteville had obtained exact information of his course, and finding that he must pass through the forest by Viviers, had lain in wait for him, with the expectation both of revenge and plunder.

"And now, Monsieur de Blénau," said Chavigni, "whither does your immediate path lie? You know you can trust me." "I do," said De Blénau. "I go first towards Viviers, to the château of the late Marquis de Beaumont." "And I go there, too," said Chavigni. "I am even now expected; for I sent forward a servant to announce, my coming." "Indeed!" exclaimed De Blènaux, "may I ask your errand?"

A faint smile curled Chavigni's lip. "You will hear on my arrival," said he; "for I see you are ignorant of what has lately taken place. But let us have our wounded brought along, and we will proceed to the château; it cannot be far distant." The château was soon reached, and Pauline de Beaumont was once more clasped in the arms of her lover.

"Madame," said Chavigni, advancing to the marchioness, "you doubtless wonder as much as Monsieur de Blènaux what can have brought me hither. But as I came to Montpellier, I had the king's commands to inform you that the fine which was imposed upon your estates is remitted. And to you, Monsieur de Blènaux, I have to announce that your banishment is at an end, for his majesty has given permission for all exiles to return to France. I need not tell you from these circumstances, that—the Cardinal de Richelieu is dead!" "Good God!" exclaimed De Blènaux; "so soon!" "Even so!" replied Chavigni. "Monsieur de Blènaux, doubtless you are happy, for he was your enemy. But he was to me a friend—he was nearly a father, and I mourn for him." "May he rest in peace!" said De Blènaux. "He was a great man. May he rest in peace!"

Little more remains to be said; for this long history draws towards its close. The sorrows, the dangers, and the difficulties, which had so long surrounded De Blènaux and Pauline, had now passed away, like the storms of a summer day, that overcloud the morning, but leave the evening calm and fair. They were united: in the beautiful valleys of Languedoc, and in the fair scenes where they had first met, they continued to live on in happiness and love, till the hand of time led them gently to the grave.
